A legacy for the Methodist Homes for the Aged is a means many generous people adopt in expressing gratitude for their own home and for serenity and peace-of-mind in their old age.

There are so many who are less fortunate and for lonely and anxious old people the Methodist Homes for the Aged are a haven and a home. Our constantly growing income from legacies, more than any other factor, has enabled us to embark on the capital expenditure for twenty-six Homes. To all those in search of a primer on the levy provisions of The Land Commission Act 1967, this work can be confidently recommended.

The Financial Times, December 4th, 1967

The Land Commission Act 1967 – even ignoring the many regulations already made under it – covers some 189 pages with extraordinarily abstruse language. What then is the busy man to do who wants to find out quickly what the levy is all about and how it works? One very good answer is to acquire a copy of this handy paperback which, in 120 pages, gives a succinct account of the principal provisions, with appropriately illuminating examples.

1968 - The Last Chance

UMAN nature being what it is, it is natural to assume that whatever the new year may have in store for the U.K. economy it cannot be worse than the experience of the year just ended. Certainly in the immediate aftermath of devaluation, the public could fairly claim that nothing in Ministerial pronouncements on the subject suggested that matters would be worse. In more recent weeks, however, a belated effort is being made to warn the nation that the year ahead will be more than usually difficult even if, at the end of the tunnel, glimpses of daylight may be seen.

The key to the revival of the U.K. economy and with it faster economic growth, permitting higher living standards in line with general expectations, is the balance of payments. While it is generally accepted that the virtually unilateral devaluation of sterling provides British exports with a significant advantage, there are doubts regarding both the extent to which British industry is ready to exploit that advantage and the overall benefit to export earnings likely to ensue. Thus, as far as British manufacturers are concerned, the benefits of the devaluation are significantly offset by the additions to their costs arising from the loss of the export rebate and SET premium, coupled with increased raw material costs and higher costs generally.

Even so, there seems little doubt in official circles that exports will, subject to fulfilment of conditions discussed below, increase substantially. Likewise, higher import costs should reduce domestic demand so that even if such cost increases are likely to be felt sooner than other changes, in the longer run the improvement in the balance of payments account should be substantial. It is, however, on the timing of the improvement where differences of opinion are most marked.

The Government expects that already by the second half of 1968 the balance of payments should be in substantial surplus. In contrast, the National Institute Economic Review takes the view that the benefits of devaluation for the external account will not emerge until 1969, with 'the balance of trade only just improving in the fourth quarter of 1968'. But in 1969, the Economic Review anticipates that 'on any reasonable assumptions, there should be a very big improvement'.

The matter of timing is by no means of secondary importance. It is not simply that the full benefits to the economy may be delayed; if that were the only issue, the Government could feel its difficulties were virtually at an end. The problem is whether the Government can induce organized labour to defer income increases until such time as the expansionist forces based upon the export-led boom make themselves felt.

There is no question that the devaluation will have a substantial reflationary effect, due to the higher volume of exports coupled with the displacement of imported goods by increased domestic output. In short, some reduction in the present level of registered unemployment can be expected by the spring. The key problem is the same as before the devaluation. Can wage and salary awards be kept within the bounds dictated by the increases in the gross national output actually achieved? Government spokesmen have been at pains to stress that pay increases will henceforth be made after the productivity gains have been achieved and not in expectation thereof.

The test of the Government's determination to ensure that this does happen will not be long deferred. The National Board for Prices and Incomes have provided the Government with an excellent test case in their virtual rejection of the recent engineering wage settlement. The Government has affirmed its intention to rely upon voluntary restraint in such matters and, in the light of past experience coupled with the inevitable reaction of organized labour to the price increases engendered by the devaluation, it is difficult to see how this policy will achieve any greater measure of success than it has in the past.

If, then, there is to be virtually no effective restraint on incomes, the Government must fall back on other weapons. The Government's economic policy must ensure that resources are not diverted to meeting home demands instead of export needs. Since the National Institute Economic Review expects disposable incomes to increase by 7 per cent during 1968 – the result of awards coupled with higher overtime earnings – consumer demand must be held in check. To intensify the credit squeeze would affect adversely the growth possibilities of British industry, therefore, the Government must rely in the main on reductions in the demands of the public sector and on higher taxes.

The cuts in public sector spending announced immediately after devaluation were, as the memorandum from the Confederation of British Industry stressed, totally inadequate. Since then it has become clear that the Government has taken the point and larger cuts – probably in defence and nationalized industry investment plans – will undoubtedly be made. Whether these are the cuts which are in the best long-term interests of the nation, or on a sufficient scale to ease the strain on domestic resources, remains to be seen.

Given the pressure for wage and salary increases which rising prices will generate, any substantial increases in taxation would be contrary to sense, not least because the only economically relevant increases would be those which fell on the middle incomes and mass consumer spending, rather than the politically attractive wealth tax and the extension of the surcharge on the surtax. In other words, this year's Budget will be the dominant factor in the economic situation. If it reduces domestic claims on the national output, then the devaluation may provide Britain with the exportled breakthrough to higher economic growth which has eluded her for over a decade.

Some increases in taxation there must be and, before the memory of the devaluation becomes too remote and personal spending too heavy in anticipation of future price increases, it would be as well if the new Chancellor emphasized his intentions by some pre-Budget tax changes, if only to stress the urgency of the situation. It seems inevitable that the July surcharge on surtax payers will remain after April. It is almost certain that, if only for its propaganda value, some of the more obvious loopholes in estate duty will be blocked, although a gift tax may well accompany or replace such a move. There is certainly a case for increasing indirect taxes, initially by using the regulator, as well as extending purchase tax to a wider range of consumer goods.

There is, however, an obvious limit to such a policy. Even such modest tax increases will be unacceptable unless the Government begins to do what it should have done years ago, that is, to cut its own expenditure. The obvious question is whether the Government will have the political courage to sacrifice some of its 'sacred cows', more particularly the re-imposition of prescription charges and withdrawal of the additional family allowance. The outcome of the controversy over local council rents, which has now been referred to the Prices Board, will be as good a touchstone as any of the Government's willingness to enforce cuts in domestic claims on resources, even at the expense of some electoral support.

It may seem ironic that such limited measures would do more than anything else within the Government's competence to resolve the continuing doubts concerning the future of sterling. The devaluation represents only the first stage of the climb back to a viable economy. The second indispensable requirement is that the Government should enjoy the confidence of the business community at home, not to mention foreign holders of sterling. Nothing that the Government has done so far seems likely to engender that sorely needed confidence.

What happens to the economy in 1968 and at the polls in 1970 will be determined by the Government's actions in the first few months of this year. The sooner the economic Ministers show to the satisfaction of informed opinion that they possess the strength of will to exploit effectively the opportunities which the devaluation has provided, the easier will the task of creating an economically viable Britain prove to be. The time has come when policy must dictate the pattern of development rather than, as has been the case for more than two decades, events dictating policy. Any sacrifices, stresses and strains will be tolerable if public opinion is convinced that, as a result, a new era of growth and prosperity will ensue.

Revenue Bill

THE purpose of the Revenue Bill published at the end of last month is to end entitlement (save in development areas) to the payment of sums additional to the repayment of the selective employment tax and at the same time to end the export rebate scheme. Clause I provides that payments additional to refund of selective employment tax shall only be made when the employment concerned is in or from establishments or parts of undertakings wholly situated within development areas. Clause 2 provides that exported goods will not qualify for export rebate after March 31st, 1908, unless the Board of Trade issues a certificate that the exportation is under a written contract of sale made before November 19th, 1967, in which payment was expressed in sterling and which cannot be varied to take account of changes in exchange rates or cancellation of export rebate. Each of the two clauses is expected to save £100 million in a full year.

expected to save £100 million in a full year.

The Board of Trade request firms making application for certificates under clause 2 to use the standard forms of application supplied by the Board – a separate form for each contract – which are obtainable immediately from The Export Rebate Certificate Office, Board of Trade, Colman House, Victoria Avenue, Southend-on-Sea, Essex.

Applications on the forms can, in fact, be made before the Bill becomes law, and must be made in any case within one month thereafter. Certificates issued must be retained so that the holder can quote the serial number when applying for rebate from H.M. Customs.

Added Value Taxes

N accordance with the recommendations of the Fiscal Commission of the European Economic Community, France and West Germany have introduced, as from January 1st, a new added value tax. By 1970 all the member countries of the E.E.C. will have harmonized their tax systems and the T.V.A. will be a feature of the common system.

Whereas in West Germany the new tax will replace the turnover tax which has existed for more than half a century, the change in France will be from the existing form of T.V.A. to a modified, i.e. standardized E.E.C, form. At present the tax applies to most manufactured products, but now it will also apply to retail distributors who will charge the tax on the basis of their gross profit margin at a standard rate of 16.6 per cent, with lower rates applying to foodstuffs. The new rate is slightly below the current 20 per cent rate chargeable at each stage of the manufacturing and wholesaling processes.

The effect of the change in France will be to reduce the Government's revenue and the Minister of Finance has stated that some price reductions should be possible

MAN OF ACCOUNT

Sir Reginald Wilson, B.Com., C.A.

SIR REGINALD WILSON, B.COM., C.A., has been named by the Minister of Transport as Chairman of the Organizing Committee to prepare for the setting up of the National Freight Corporation. This body, not to be confused with the Freight Integration Council, will take over the road haulage subsidiaries of the Transport Holding Co, with their 19,000 vehicles, the 'sundries' services of the railways, and the terminal and commercial aspects of Freight Liner and Tartan Arrow services.

A Scottish chartered accountant, Sir Reginald was admitted to membership of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland in 1928. He spent much of his early career abroad in many different parts of the world, becoming in 1937 a partner of Whinney Murray & Co – at that time the joint Continental firm of Whinney Smith & Whinney and Brown Fleming & Murray.

Whinney and Brown Fleming & Murray.

During the war he served in the Ministry of Shipping and the Ministry of War Transport and was later Joint Financial Adviser to the Ministry of Transport. At the beginning of 1946 he returned to Brown Fleming & Murray in the City of London, but by the end of 1947 was again involved in public affairs, being responsible initially for organizing the financial affairs of the new British Transport Commission. Giving up this particular responsibility in 1954, he was Chairman of the Eastern Transport Board from 1955 to 1960 and Chairman of the London Midland Board from 1960 to 1962, when the big battles over electrification where being fought out.

He is now one of the senior partners in Whinney Murray & Co, following the recent merger of the two firms concerned. As well as being President of the Institute of Transport in 1957–58, he served as a member of the Royal Commission on the Press in 1946 and was Vice-Chairman of the Hemel Hempstead Development Corporation for ten years subsequently. Among other current interests, he is Chairman of one of the London Teaching Hospitals.

In November of this year he became Chairman of the Transport Holding Company, having been Deputy Chairman since its inception in 1962.

Reference was also made in Parliament by the Minister of Transport to the future appointment of Sir Reginald as Chairman of the National Freight Corporation. But this was subject, of course, to the proposals of the Bill being approved by Parliament in due course, and for this and other reasons it is perhaps premature to speculate on the circumstances in which, a year from now, Sir Reginald may be assuming this responsibility.

although some prices will rise. In fact, reactions to the new proposals make it clear that price increases will far outnumber reductions. This is despite the French Government's efforts to publicize and explain the nature of the proposed changes. One reason for the apparent haste on the part of the French to adopt the common tax is that fiscal reform has been long outstanding. It is also hoped that the tax will stimulate efficiency and modernization, not least because of the deductions to be allowed in respect of new investment.

Much the same uncertainty regarding the effects of the new tax has been expressed in West Germany as in France. In West Germany the proposed rate will be 10 per cent and the rate on food half that figure. In the case of exports, the full tax paid is recouped. German industry hopes that the tax rebate will be operated more effectively under the new tax than was the case under the old turnover tax. At the same time, imports will become slightly more expensive. In other words, the West Germans are in effect contending that the new tax will have somewhat similar effects to a modest devaluation of the Deutschemark.

Whatever the outcome in these two countries, their experience will be invaluable for other E.E.C. member countries before 1970, not to mention the U.K., which must begin seriously to consider a similar revision of its indirect taxes.

Redundancy Payments Scheme in Ireland

N New Year's Day the Irish Republican Redundancy Payments Act came into force. Announcing this last week the Minister for Labour, Dr Hillery, said that a worker builds up certain rights in his job over the years and must be compensated if he loses it through no fault of his own. More than six hundred thousand workers, representing 70 per cent of Ireland's labour force, are covered by the scheme.

Workers between the ages of 60 and 70 who are insured for benefits under the Social Welfare Acts are covered under the scheme. To benefit they must have been continuously in employment for at least four years with the same employer, working at least twenty-one hours per week. Workers who cease to be insured for social welfare benefits within two years before redundancy will also be covered.

Contributions are at the rate of 1s per week for men (employer 8d, employee 4d) and 9d per week for women (employer 6d, employee 3d). A worker declared redundant will become entitled to a lump sum of half a normal week's pay for each year's employment between the ages of 16 and 41, and a week's pay for every year after that. The maximum will be twenty weeks' pay.

Payment will be made direct to the worker by the employer, who will then be entitled to recoup half the sum from the Redundancy Fund. Employers giving more than two weeks' notice may recoup up to a maximum of 65 per cent. Redundant employees will also receive a weekly payment of half a normal week's wages, to the extent of one weekly payment for each year in the job between 16 and 41. After 41 each two years worked will count as three. Payments will be in addition to unemployment and social welfare benefits.

Workers will be considered redundant when the reason for their dismissal arises from the closing, partial or complete, of their place of employment or because their employer needs fewer workers. A certain degree of redundancy, the Minister told a Press conference, was an inescapable feature of a dynamic and expanding economy. The new legislation was part of the Government's general manpower policy.

Another Section 28 Direction Upheld

THE notorious section 28 of the Finance Act 1960, with its many amendments, continues to give rise to perplexity, litigation, and deep inroads into tax-payers' pockets. The section empowers the Inland Revenue to make directions countering tax avoidance in connection with 'transactions in securities' in a great many circumstances. As the section contains its own dictionary, it can be made to apply to all kinds of unexpected cases. The taxpayer can escape if he can show two things: (1) that the transactions were carried out either for bona fide commercial reasons or in the ordinary course of making or managing investments;

This is My Life

by An Industrious Accountant

WHEN it comes to campaigns to cut costs the first target should always be paper work. In our company there are some glory-hunters who always go gunning for the impressive objective which sounds good at boardroom level but doesn't always show up too well in subsequent analysis. Others have a strictly negative approach and merely try to prohibit major expenditure. Few think of paper as the main enemy it is – like a running sore which saps the strength.

Take Ilkley, the factory manager, for example. When the managing director recently turned the heat on him for lower costs, Ilkley proclaimed that he'd save a stack of money by cutting down on overtime work. It was exorbitantly costly at double and treble rates, and the percentage looked damning in his reports. Therefore overtime must be minimized. 'All that brass for nowt! It's reet sinful', said Ilkley.

Well, he went into conclave with his subordinates and the personnel director; they amassed statistics ad nauseam from accounts and worked out a brilliant plan. Higher pay by way of a built-in increment in return for union agreement to support a minimum-overtime scheme. The union collaborated. The staff agreed to try it. Ilkley's interim progress report on the subject glowed with satisfaction. It was a brilliant plan.

Unfortunately, it didn't work out in practice. The fatter pay packets were welcomed and in return the overtime diminished at first almost to the point anticipated. It was startling to see how productivity increased and what the machines could do when running flat out. Ilkley put two of his senior people on calculating and circulating new output norms, machine down-time, and optimum off-take patterns, and then two more on analysing overtime into normal, abnormal, emergency and backlog, for the passing months. Reports proliferated.

Then somehow productivity tapered off to previous averages and overtime crept relentlessly up again, at the new high rates. Ilkley raged in vain. The managing director's latest comments on his over-run budget have almost amounted to an ultimatum.

Scotty, the sales manager, made the same mistake. He set himself a reasonably high turnover/rate of profit target and decided to build up snap ad hoc reports – quicker and more detailed than the punched-cards could give him – of stock movements. His assistants analysed for some scores of items – the days-on-shelf, the ratio of display to unit sales, the colour preferences, shocking pink versus 'trad diaphanous', and the pay-off of the new jargon styles of Carnaby Street, Quant, and mini-pelmets.

He encouraged his favourite deputy, Bertie (who needed no encouragement in this particular activity), to issue eloquently inspiring bulletins to the sales staff. Their literary style varied from Churchillian heroics to a spurious rash of 'fabs' and 'swinging boutiques', with purple patches of psychology. These had a 'know yourself' slant, explaining how by eliminating neuroses and timidity the aspiring sales assistants could treble their business. Bertie meant well, but the staff felt sick.

We debited the salaries, the duplicating charges and the stationery to Scotty's budget, and threw in percentage overheads as well just for devilment, and Scotty looked sick in his turn. He had assumed, he said, that these items would be absorbed in office sundries. Some hope! we said; not while the accounts department were responsible for office sundries!

It's now occurred to Scotty that maybe the same time, thought and trouble, if applied to selling rather than to filling-in forms, might have resulted in better budget variances. Anyhow, he's thrown out the exhortations and now concentrates on higher turnover. Anticipation of the forthcoming interview with the managing director has had a wonderful effect on his analytical thought-processes, and he doesn't need any reports to highlight his problem.

and (2) that none of the transactions, as their main object or one of their main objects, enabled tax advantages to be obtained.

In Hague v. C.I.R. the appellant taxpayer satisfied the Special Commissioners on (1) but failed on (2). He was a shareholder in Hagues Textiles Ltd, trading as cotton and rayon spinners. After the Government White Paper on reorganization of the cotton industry and the Cotton Industry Act 1959, the company disposed of two of its four mills with the machinery in them and received £112,976 compensation. It also became liable to levies of £58,986.

Some shareholders wanted to liquidate the company, which would produce an estimated £1 million. The directors wanted to rationalize and continue in business. The issued capital was £284,235 and it was decided to pay this out as money surplus to requirements. New capital of £189,490 was created by bonus issue and the £284,235 was paid out. Mr Hague received £,24,022 and his wife (who was not separately assessed) received £7,500. The Revenue made a section 28 direction on both of them.

The Special Commissioners accepted their argument that the transaction was a bona fide commercial one but were not satisfied that avoidance of tax was not one of the main objects. Mr Justice Cross refused to disturb this decision, just as the House of Lords refused to disturb a favourable decision in C.I.R. v. Brebner (46 ATC 17). As to quantum, his lordship said that the proper amount to take of the £24,022 for section 28 was the fraction thereof represented by a numerator of £129,400 (i.e. that part of the bonus issue which came from the profit and loss account), the denominator being £473,275 (the total issued capital immediately before the reduction).

Mrs Hague also appealed on the ground that section 28 was not effective to charge her. The Revenue relied on the decision of Ungoed-Thomas, J., in C.I.R. v. Brook ([1967] T.R. 159). Mr Justice Cross said he appreciated some of the criticisms of this case and was not sure that he himself would have come to the same conclusion, but the language of sections 28 and 43 was very obscure and he was not sure that Brook was wrongly decided. Accordingly, he would follow it.

This particular lacuna in section 28 had been closed for later cases by the Finance Act 1962 which deals specifically with married women.

Friendly Societies' Statistics

CELECTED decisions on disputes of general interest or involving special points of law in relation to Post Office and other savings banks deposits, savings certificates, etc., given in 1966 are reproduced in Part 1 (General) of the Report of the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies for 1966 (H.M.S.O. price 5s 6d).

The number of societies and other bodies at the end of 1966 submitting returns to the Registrar was 21,425 - 110 less than at the end of the previous year. There were 496 additions to the register, of which 431 were societies registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Acts including 364 housing societies. Of the 606 removals, 387 were the result of transfers of engagements.

A Critical Review

by M. J. GREENER, B.A., F.C.A.

OR poets and pedants alike the question of communication is one that presents as many difficulties as there are persons to listen or to read. No man may hope to communicate the same idea to each member of his audience. Perhaps at times he may not even wish to. Nevertheless there are times when it is important, either for legal or personal reasons, to be as exact as possible and to avoid or minimize any misunderstanding. In certain fields the problem may be tackled by attempting to devise a standard language where the meaning of particular words is closely defined.

The accountant faces this problem in the terms he uses when compiling a set of accounts for his client or employer, for presentation through that employer to the public. He also faces the problem more directly when, as so frequently is the case, he is in a position involving considerable responsibility in industry, and in liaison with the directors of the larger public companies he must take an active part in, or is at least able to express a formidable opinion on, the way information is to be offered to the shareholder and the public.

A brief cool look at some recent accounts of major companies throws some doubt on the success of any efforts at meeting the difficulties mentioned. This shows itself principally in a lack of consistency both in terminology and classification.

ACCOUNTANT

Description

To begin with perhaps the less important, while it is commendable that a company should seek to present information required by law in a manner that is both attractive and informative, it is surely preferable that some uniformity of description should be employed.

There are doubtless varying views on the aptness of title, nevertheless to find in a random selection of twenty-seven companies (see appendix) that thirteen (50 per cent) describe their annual booklet in differing ways is a little bewildering. Basically each contains the accounts required by law, a directors' report, a review of activities and supplementary information.

Chairman's review

The general review is traditionally in the form or guise of a chairman's report or statement; it is doubtful, however, if the chairman writes it and perhaps companies such as I.C.I. are wiser in letting it remain anonymous. Some chairmen use it as a 'soap-box' either for expressing political or quasi-political opinion, or for attempting to put over their own personality: Lord Thomson, for instance, castigates the Monopolies Commission for taking so long to approve his take-over of The Times. Mr Julian Hodge, on the other hand, in commenting on the not too hopeful trend of profit, forlornly bewails the fact that hire-purchase restrictions ever allowed more than thirty months to pay and a deposit of less than 30 per cent.

In any event there seems to be a growing tendency for this review, with all the snippets of information and batteries of figures – where favourable – to be separated from the chairman's report or statement, and often featured as a major section with charts and graphs. The chairman's statement then becomes a rather more formal or personal message.

It might be sensible if the policy of one of the most British of companies – Rolls-Royce – were followed and the annual review provided in a separate cover identical in size and presentation but titled Review of Activities 1966-67, the accounts being clearly confined to a booklet entitled most frankly Statement of Accounts and Directors' Report for the year ended December 31st, 1066.

It is interesting that Rolls-Royce should be setting a lead in this way, while the Thomson Organization retains all its information in one booklet. Surely a colour supplement should have arrived by now!

As a footnote, it is instructive to observe the absolute simplicity of one set of accounts and directors' statement with nothing on the cover but a picture of a tall building, a few daffodils and the name of the company – Hodge Industrial Securities Ltd.

Treatment of taxation

So far, this article has been concerned with the title; it seems fair now to open the book. Here problems, or rather differences engendering problems, are all too frequent. One questions first the varying treatment of taxation in the balance sheet. There are three items, or could be:

- (1) tax due as an agreed liability;
- (2) tax due on the accounts presented but not yet agreed;
- (3) an amount commonly known as the tax equalization account.

Whether all three items appear depends, first, on the date of the accounts, and secondly, on whether amounts are in fact set aside for equalization of taxation. The amount due and agreed may have already been paid, on the other hand, even though apparently due it may not have been paid. For example, A.B.M. accounts dated January 1st, 1967, include as a current liability the tax payable on January 1st, 1967. As far as tax equalization is concerned, of the twenty-seven companies under review, seven do not appear to deal with this at all.

Before going on to make comparisons it may be as well to make one or two general observations as to the treatment of these items in the accounts of public companies. The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales is in favour of treating taxation on the profits for the year as a current liability or separately as a deferred liability. It points out that the amount is a definite liability though the actual figure may not yet be certain. Accordingly, it is adamant in insisting that it should not be included as a revenue or capital reserve.

The Institute is also against describing it as a reserve for future taxation. This would confuse it with income tax due on accounts where the old system applied and where income tax on the profits for that year was only a conditional liability. These seem sensible attitudes, though it would seem preferable that the amount be shown as a deferred liability separately from current liability where the payment date is more than a year hence.

Tax equalization

So far as tax equalization is concerned the Institute is not in favour of including this item with either of the amounts set aside for taxation. This sharply differs from the views of the Scottish Institute expressed in a paper published in these columns on December 18th, 1965. These suggest that items (2) and (3) above be grouped together.

Looking at it from another point of view it seems reasonable to argue that the amount set aside for equalization of taxation, even though it arises from differences between capital allowances and depreciation provisions, is a reserve in a sense that it is a voluntary appropriation of profits. This is so even though it is to be brought back into account in later years. The directors are under no obligation to set this sum aside. As has been pointed out, many companies do not bother and there is no legal reason why it should not be distributed in dividend. True, profits may be low in years to come but this is not strictly relevant.

It may be said that the present tax system makes this provision or reserve an accounting necessity, though not all auditors seem to agree; but it might also be suggested that it is not the allowances for tax purposes that are at fault but the method of depreciation. At all events it is submitted that the only sensible treatment of this item in the balance sheet is as a 'Reserve for the equalization of taxation' and shown as a separate heading — preferably included with capital reserves or those items that would have been capital reserves, were the law able to appreciate that these reserves do in fact exist even though they may be difficult to define.

It is interesting at this point to compare the actual treatment of these items, or rather items (2) and (3), in the accounts of the companies under review. Of these – all public companies – thirteen show the tax due on the accounts for the year as a current liability; four show it as a separate item – 'Corporation tax payable'; two show it with tax equalization account under the heading of 'Deferred liability'; one shows it as a deferred liability with 'Tax equalization account' as a separate heading; two show it under a separate heading as a 'provision for deferred taxation'; four describe it separately as 'Deferred taxation'; and one describes it as 'Future taxation'.

Auditors' differing opinions

As far as 'Tax equalization account' is concerned, ten show this as a separate heading; three show it as 'Deferred liability'; two show it as 'Deferred taxation'; three show it as a 'Provision for deferred taxation'; and the remainder do not appear to show it at all. Do not all auditors think this account necessary? As a point of interest, of the eighteen companies that apparently show tax equalization accounts, only seven group it with the tax payable on the profit for the year.

Speaking of auditors, it seems that even within one firm different opinions can arise. One international firm responsible for five of the companies shows tax equalization account as a separate heading for two companies; as 'Deferred liability' for one; and for the other two does not appear to show it at all. Another firm responsible for six companies shows tax equalization account as 'Deferred taxation' in one instance; as a separate heading in another; as a provision in another; as a 'Provision for deferred taxation' in two, and in the sixth it does not seem to appear at all.

As far as a tax on the profits for the year is concerned, the first firm shows this as a 'Current liability' in three of the companies, as a 'Deferred liability' in the other two. The second firm shows it as a 'Current liability' in one company, as a separate item - 'Corporation tax payable' - in two, as 'Deferred taxation' in a fourth, and in the remaining two as 'Provision for deferred taxation'. It may be noted that with reference to one company treating both corporation tax and tax equalization account as separate headings, that these are both included in 'Total capital employed'. This surely is difficult to defend.

It is not suggested that auditors should follow, or are bound to follow, any particular method, but it would be pleasant to think they were consistent. It is acknowledged that the auditors do not necessarily prepare the accounts or, indeed, have the last word in the way accounts are presented, but in these matters their advice is generally accepted.

Treatment of investments

The treatment of investments in the accounts of public companies has always created problems, partly because of their varying nature and partly because of the different approach of the Companies Acts and the accountant. It is not proposed to deal with this in great detail. However, it must be pointed out that there is a serious lack of consistency in the manner in which investments are dealt with in the accounts of the sample companies.

The new Companies Act 1967 seems to abolish the necessity to distinguish trade from other investments. The reason for this is obscure. There is a definite class of investments that can fairly be described as trade investments, as they are made for the purposes of trade or for the furthering of the principal objects of the business. These are distinguished from those investments that represent money at call or short notice.

It might be argued that there is a third category, being investments in other businesses in no way connected with the business of the investing company but for the purpose of speculation or making additional profit. However, if the company is branching out into other fields then it is presumably trading within the objects clause in its memorandum. Otherwise the funds are merely, as mentioned above, money at call.

The distinction between trade investments and other investments has, indeed, been recognized in most of the sampled accounts. The point at issue seems to be the way in which these items are shown. For instance, there seems to be some doubt as to whether trade investments are or are not fixed assets, or for that matter whether other investments are or are not current assets. Some companies prefer to group all investments under a separate heading quite apart from fixed or current assets. The number of variations on this theme is quite considerable. There seems to be no reason why all assets cannot be either fixed or current. Despite the fact that the 1967 Companies Act does not specify that these headings should be used, trade investments would then be fixed and other investments current. The reason for this is fairly obvious.

Of the twenty-seven companies under review, twenty-five admit to having trade investments; of these their balance sheet treatment is as follows:

(a) seven show 'Trade investments' as a separate heading with 'Other investments';

ACCOUNTANT.

- (b) nine show 'Trade investments' as a separate heading no 'Other investments' being shown;
- (c) six show 'Trade investments' as a separate heading, and treat 'Other investments' as current assets;
- (d) three show 'Trade investments' as fixed assets; and 'Other investments' as current assets.

This seems to indicate an unfortunate lack of consistency in the profession. It may be that a certain variation in the presentation of information is not to be frowned upon, but where the difference suggests that matters of principle are at stake, the question becomes rather more serious. As a point of additional interest regarding the two firms previously mentioned, the one responsible for the audit of five companies uses the three methods (a), (c) and (d) above. The other firm responsible for the audit of six companies is rather more consistent and uses for five different companies methods (a) and (c), which are very closely related; the sixth company has no trade investments and 'Other investments' are shown as current assets.

Capital profits

A third major difference of opinion concerns capital profits and their treatment. Fundamental agreement is lacking as to whether these should be shown in the profit and loss account as profit for the year; in the appropriation account as additions to profit brought forward; or as direct transfers to a reserve. Again there seems to be some difficulty in deciding whether a capital reserve should be credited or a general reserve.

The problems here are somewhat complicated. Profits or losses may arise on sale or disposal of an asset or on revaluation. The profit may be a real profit, it may be an inflationary profit, or it may merely represent excess depreciation written off. Any excess depreciation written off is essentially a revenue profit; it represents, in fact, short-stated profit in previous years. It may possibly be included in the appropriation accounts suitably described, but is better shown as an adjustment to a general reserve. On no account should it be included in the profit and loss account proper as it has nothing to do with the profit for the year.

Real capital profits – i.e. those arising from genuine accretions in value and not being inflationary profits – have nothing to do with the profit for the year (i.e. the trading profit) and should be directly credited to a reserve account. As these reserves since the Dimbula Valley judgment can now be distributed, it seems immaterial whether they are put to a capital or revenue reserve – the distinction has now been legally abandoned. But in reality, however, the distinction still exists for there is necessarily a category of reserve that cannot, by law, be distributed or should not in the interests of the company be distributed. Apart from which, capital profits that are merely the result of inflation are not profits in the real sense of the word. They often arise on revaluation. When they can be separated they should be credited directly to reserve, or preferably to capital reserve for they are, in fact, part of the original capital subscribed or employed. They cannot be considered strictly as profits available for distribution.

How are these various items treated in the accounts we are discussing? Of the eighteen companies confessing to having made capital profits normally being surplus on sale of fixed assets – (a) three credit a profit direct to profit and loss account; (b) three show it in an appropriation account; (c) two credit it direct to revenue reserve; (d) the remainder credit it direct to capital reserve.

Here again there is an inconsistency that would appear to be quite serious — a lack of consistency, moreover, within the auditing firms themselves. Looking again at the firms previously referred to — the one uses three different methods, the other two different methods. Why?

Capital losses

Another interesting point arising out of one company's accounts is how far capital losses may be set off against capital profits. If both are real then it is difficult to see why there could be any objection, provided the true state of affairs is explained. In the accounts of Mount Charlotte Investments Ltd we are told that heavy losses were incurred in a discontinuation of part of the business, and are referred to as capital losses. At the same time, remaining properties of the group were revalued on a going concern basis, which disclosed an increase in value of £711,026. The capital loss of £433,822 has been set off against this figure.

It is not, of course, suggested that the company is doing anything illegal but the question must be asked: How much of the increase in value was in part or in whole a fictitious profit? That is to say, did any part arise from the fall in the value of money? If it did, and if the fictitious element exceeds the difference between the two figures stated, then real losses have been set off against fictitious profits. This is surely unacceptable and is effectively an unauthorized reduction of capital. This type of thing happens frequently when companies distribute as capital profits fictitious profits made on revaluation. It may be legal but it is not logical.

Valuation of fixed assets

There are many other inconsistencies to which attention might be drawn, including the whole question of the statement of fixed assets. This probably poses as many questions as there are accountants to answer them. Suffice it to point out here that in the accounts examined, the number of variations in effective methods of valuation is quite ridiculous.

Some companies show assets at cost or valuation; some companies show assets at valuation. This in itself is bad enough, but when we have one company showing some assets at cost, some at valuation at one date, and some at valuation at another date; and when the valuations themselves are made on varying principles, one begins to wonder whether any sensible comparisons could possibly be made between the return on capital of one company and of another. For instance, in the Boots group accounts, part of the assets were valued in 1958, part in 1965 and part are shown at cost. This applies both to freeholds and leaseholds, totalling over £50 million.

When it comes to methods of valuation, the accounts of Sears Holdings show the problems that can arise both for the company and for the analyst. For some reason land and buildings were revalued partly on the basis of open market value assuming vacant possession, and partly on the basis of present use.

It is true that problems will arise in group accounts, and it is with group accounts that we have been largely concerned. Each member of the group does not necessarily adopt the same method of valuation, and it may not always, perhaps, be practicable for revaluations to be made on the same date; for example, if the assets of the group are at cost and it takes over another company with assets valued at up-to-date prices, it might not be practicable for the whole group to revalue on the basis adopted by one member; nor would it be possible for the new member to back-date its assets to historical cost. The problems, indeed, seem to be of frightening proportions, but it would at least be pleasant to think that serious efforts were being made to solve them.

The position is made worse by the fact that different methods of depreciation are used, thus giving artificially created written-down values. The new Companies Act 1967 for some reason does not make it necessary for a company to state the method of depreciation it is using.

Problems of classification

As a final point, attention may be drawn to the general problems of classification. The new Companies Act does not require assets to be grouped as fixed or current, neither does it insist on a classification of current liabilities. So long, therefore, as these headings are used, some decision should be arrived at as to their meaning.

Most companies show bank overdraft as a current liability; Imperial Tobacco show it as a separate heading. Why? Bank overdraft is, or tends to be, a major item in company accounts. It is important to know whether or not it is to be used as a current liability in calculating liquid or current ratios.

The current ratio without the bank overdraft would be a very different figure from the current ratio with the bank overdraft. It may be argued that bank overdraft, when a permanent feature of finance, is – in fact if not in name – a long-term liability and should be treated as such, or at least the greater part of it is and should be so treated. There may be an agreement with the bank that it cannot be called in at short notice, and if this is the case, some indication should be given. If not, then the figure is quite definitely a current liability.

For some companies to treat it as such and some not, will play havoc with trends and inter-company comparisons.

The whole question of what constitutes current liabilities revolves around the question whether the funds can be recalled at short notice, say, less than a year. For this reason, an item in the accounts of Anglo Auto deserves clarification: the group accounts show as a separate heading, 'Short-term Loan (Unsecured) £3,542,157'; in a note it is explained that this is a loan to one of the subsidiaries, guaranteed by the holding company. How short is this loan? Who lent the money? Surely the shareholders have a right to know. The guarantee, too, is interesting. The loan is nearly three times the available remaining group overdraft facilities of £1,275,128 out of £6,013,262. It is also not far short of one hundred times the cost of the group freehold property at £37,716.

But perhaps it is hardly fair to single out one company as if it were the only offender. So much information – outside the scope of statutory requirement – is lacking in so many company accounts, and so few pains are taken to ensure consistency in the presentation of the information that is given.

New Zealand and Decimal Currency

A Progress Report

by A. W. GRAHAM, B.Com., F.R.A.N.Z., F.C.I.S.

FIVE months has passed since DC-Day – that fine, brisk July day when that most British of dominions discarded the currency of the first 127 years of its life, to join the world of dollars and cents. How successful has the operation been, and how has it been accepted by the community?

On the technical side, the change is obvious enough. Reserve bank notes in the old currency have disappeared and few halfpennies, pennies, or threepenny pieces still circulate. Coins which are interchangeable – the sixpenny, one-shilling and two-shilling pieces – are still much in evidence, but cause no confusion. The new fifty cent, half-dollar, piece is now well accepted, amply justifying its introduction. The new notes have escaped the criticism of their Australian counterparts and to date have yet to attract the forger.

Thanks to enlightened leadership from their trade associations, retail stores have co-operated fully in the change. With very few exceptions, major stores are displaying goods priced in dollars and cents, a potent means of community education. Equally enlightened leadership has come from the Real Estate Institute – controller of New Zealand's land agents – which pronounced as unethical the continued sterling listing of properties. In only one area – that of second-hand motor vehicles – is listing in sterling still predominant, despite the urging of New Zealand's Decimal Currency Board.

Machinery conversion ahead of estimates

In a country as mechanized in the office sector as any in the world, the key to decimal currency conversion lay in the conversion of machines. In this field progress has been spectacular. Of 65,000 machines to be converted, 47,000 (or nearly 72 per cent) had left the conversion centres within four months of DC-Day. By the end of March, 60,000 will have been converted. Progress in this field has far exceeded estimates; the official period of eighteen months for completion of machine conversion has become ten months – a little over half the original estimate. Nearly all compensation for inconvertible machines has been distributed.

In a country not regarded as industrialized in the accepted modern sense, the achievement of an almost halved production time may cause no little surprise. In fact, several factors have combined to make this possible. New Zealand's deteriorating economic circumstances have reduced staff turnover to a much lower figure than that estimated in the flush of the 'overfull employment' era. Secondly, companies undertaking conversion have operated worth-while bonus systems, contingent on operators remaining with the companies until completion of the programme. Profitsharing by management in the conversion plants also contributed to the vastly improved performance, clearly demonstrating savings that remain to be achieved in other areas of New Zealand's industry. Finally, some technical improvements were evolved, which shortened production times experienced in Australia.

While the remarkably accelerated conversion programme has been widely welcomed, it has not been without its problems. Public accountants expecting conversion of f, s d machines towards the end of the conversion programme now find themselves embarrassed through lack of f, s d machines to complete accounts of clients in later conversion zones. The Decimal Currency Board has met this problem by making available older machines owned by the Board. In this direction, and in others, no serious difficulty has been experienced — an achievement which affords the Board no little satisfaction.

If progress with mechanization provides the physical measure of progress with conversion, in the last resort it is community acceptance which determines the success or failure of the operation. Decimal currency articles have disappeared from the newspapers along with the advertisements of the Decimal Currency Board, their place being taken by reference to the fall in the price of wool, the splendid record of New Zealand's rugby ambassadors, and the much less palatable reality of devaluation. It is as if it were five years, not five months, since the withdrawal of pounds, shillings and pence began. Faced with the reality of the change, the New Zealand public has determined to make the best of it and appears as anxious as official-dom to expedite the passing of the old system.

The change, in fact, has occurred with deceptive ease, owing its success to many years of careful planning and to the invaluable efforts of up to 700 volunteer speakers throughout New Zealand. Profiting from Australia's experience, special attention was paid to shopkeeper training, including the development of a one-hour standard training session which comprised visual aids in the form of colour slides, accompanied by long-playing recordings. Above all, the practice of 'tendering high', encouraged by the Board from the start, placed the onus for correct conversion of small amounts on the trained shop assistant or bus driver, and not on the general public. In the end, even the older people have found the transition an easy one to make.

Part played by the accounting profession

What of the accounting profession? The New Zealand Society of Accountants arranged seminars throughout New Zealand, and for the participation in them of an Australian consultant. These seminars were attended by 1,500 members throughout New Zealand one-fifth of the Society's membership. Others were reached through a regular column, prepared by a special committee, which appeared in the Society's Accountants' Journal. Supplementing those of the Board, these measures seem to have been adequate, for the profession has experienced little difficulty over the last five months. Individual accountants have played their full part in the change – apart from the Minister of Finance - the Hon. R. D. Muldoon, F.P.A.N.Z. - at least a dozen other members of the Society have been directly involved in the Board's changeover plan, including the Board's secretary, Mr J. N. L. Searle, F.R.A.N.Z., and his deputy, Mr C. C. Kilpatrick, million will now cost less than half this total — something more than a little unusual for exercises of this kind. Moreover, the surplus on the coinage account — the paper profit arising from the sale of the individual coins to the reserve bank, the recovery from the sale of metal on the old coins (greater than expected through improvements in the recovery process), and the sale of commemorative sets — has amounted to nearly $11 million. The direct cost to the New Zealand taxpayer is therefore nil — a welcome event in the dominion's straitened circumstances.

Almost incredibly, an operation expected to cost $15

Minting error

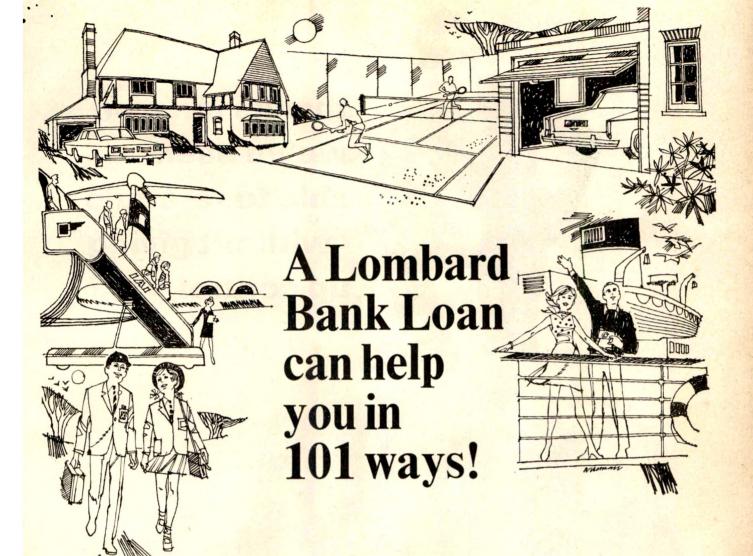

There have been other features of the change which will not soon be forgotten. Into this category falls the most spectacular minting error in the history of the Royal Mint – the production of 100,000 two-cent pieces with a New Zealand reverse and a Bahamas obverse or head. Of these, 60,000 have been recovered and melted down. Some 40,000 still remain in circulation, greatly sought by collectors at prices varying widely from 20 cents to $20.

Nor has the change been without its humorous aspects, such as the case of the old lady who would have nothing to do with the 'new fangled American currency – we will soon go back to the old'. A businessman who ought to have known better maintained that the system was unacceptable because 'it made the punctuation wrong in my calculator'. But to most, the change to 'dismal guernsey' ('Strine' for the new currency) proved little more than a nine days' wonder.

Finally, the obvious question – has it all been worth it? There are few shop assistants, pay clerks, office workers, or ledger assistants who would deny that the advantages claimed for the new system have been achieved. The process of change building is easier, and errors are fewer than customary under the old system. By most other sections of the community the change is fully accepted as a desirable concession to the streamlining of modern business. Yet it will still be many months before the influence of the old system is no longer felt. Old habits die hard, and many New Zealanders still think in £ s d and then convert to dollars and cents. But this is an easy process under the ros-cent system, and it cannot seriously be rated an important disadvantage.

By whatever standard he may apply, the most sceptical observer must concede that this major change has been achieved with efficiency and with absence of fuss – a remarkable tribute to the members and staff of the Decimal Currency Board who planned it, and to the people who have made it work.

It is true that New Zealand is a small country in which the magnitude of the change cannot compare in complexity with that of a similar change in the United Kingdom. Nevertheless, New Zealand's experience has shown that careful planning and painstaking education allied with public goodwill can render relatively painless an operation of vital importance to every member of the community.

Mr. A's engineering works boasts a tradition of craftsmanship which stretches back a century and more. Unfortunately, their equipment is also very old and a comprehensive re-tooling programme was necessary to help them to keep up with their competitors. But this programme could not be financed out of working capital; they needed outside help to the tune of some £180,000. After some hesitation, they came to I.C.F.C. Why the hesitation? Mr. A's Board was afraid that, having made the loan, I.C.F.C. would seek to dictate the company's policy. We were able to reassure them. Having satisfied ourselves that the business was in good shape and the proposition sound, we were delighted to do as we always do-let the company's directors continue to direct without reference to us. How to Ensure Balanced Stocks

by D. C. SPENCER

ALMOST every company somewhere in its operations faces the problem of having to maintain balanced stocks of a range of products, parts or materials with limited financial, production, or storage resources. These limitations may be a matter of harsh reality or of policy.

Obviously one should use one's limited rescurces so as to obtain the highest possible return on the money invested in the stock. This will be done if the stock is turned over with the utmost rapidity; to do so the stocks must always be kept in balance.

The basic idea is that whenever orders are placed this is done in such a way as to tend to bring the stocks into balance.

The balancing act

What is meant by 'into balance'? It means that they are all likely to last the same length of time. One simple method – possibly the simplest – uses a table along the following lines:

Product	Present Stock	Expected Weekly			We	eeks	Forv	vard			Production
	SLOCK	Demand	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	Required
A B C D	80 180 40 120	40 30 10 60	X X X	×××	40 X X 60	40 X X 60	40 X 10 60	40 X 10 60	40 30 10 60		200 30 30 30 300
	mand in the mulative de				100		110 310				560

The present stocks and the expected weekly demands are recorded. From this information the number of weeks' (days', hours' or any other convenient unit of time) stock of each product is calculated and entered on the table with suitable marks X. When this has been done, starting with Week 1, all the products are scrutinized to ascertain any without stock adequate for that week. All the products in the table have stock to cover Week 1 and similarly with Week 2.

When Week 3 is scrutinized, it is seen that there is no stock for Product A, so the expected weekly demand is entered, i.e. 40. Products B and C have stock for this week. Product D has no stock, so the weekly demand is entered, i.e. 60. When all products have been considered in this way, the total production required to cover this week is obtained by adding all the entries for

If this quantity of 100 does not use all the production resources then the procedure is repeated for Week 4. It is seen that another 100 will be needed to meet the needs in Week 4. This must be added to the 100 for Week 3 to give the cumulative demand, i.e., 100+100=200. But this is still less than the available production, so the process is repeated until the production limit is reached in Week 7 – in this case, 560.

To obtain the production required of each individual product, all that remains is to add the entries for each product across the table. In the case of Product A, it is 40+40+40+40=200. In the table the available production is absorbed exactly by the demands up to Week 7. Suppose the available production had been 600, there would be 600-560=40 available to allocate between the four products; 140 would be required to meet the needs of Week 8 in full, so to this product must be allotted $\frac{40}{140}$ of one week's demand and enter this in Week 8.

The expected weekly demand can be kept up to date by some automatic forecasting technique such as exponential smoothing. One firm using this stock balancing method makes its production allocation highly responsive to changes in demand by using the following rule to determine its 'expected weekly demand':

Reduce the expected weekly demand by (say) ten each week except that the figure must never be less than last week's demand. So any increase in the demand rate is immediately fully reflected in the calculations.

The tabular method described does not depend on any particular method of determining the weekly demand; where demand is irregular, or where there is knowledge of forthcoming orders, the best estimate of probable demand can be entered for each week for each product.

Some applications

The method can be used to:

- (a) control finished stocks of consumer goods, i.e., to determine the production programme;
- (b) control the manufacture of parts or sub-assemblies for subsequent processing;
- (c) share stocks between a number of warehouses;
- (d) split a bulk order in the best way;
- (e) control purchases of parts or materials.

In the latter case the method makes it possible to keep the capital value of the stock constant within narrow limits, and to vary it as necessitated by the cash flow situation.

In each case the method will maximize the service given from whatever physical or financial resources are employed. Practical experience and theoretical considerations show that the method is effective and robust. Perhaps its limitation is that is becomes cumbersome when very large numbers of items need to be considered simultaneously.

Overseas Company Tax Rates

The following table sets out the latest known rates of tax chargeable on the income of companies by the countries listed. Where tax is charged at varying rates, or more than one tax is levied, as much detail is given as space permits. Taxes and surcharges ('local') levied on the income of companies by or for provinces, municipalities, etc., are mentioned, unless they are an insignificant part of the tax charge. In some countries there are special rates for particular forms of company and for companies carrying on special trades, etc., e.g. insurance, oil; no mention of these is made in the table. While every care has been taken in the preparation of the table, its accuracy cannot be guaranteed. The table, compiled by the Board of Inland Revenue Library (Foreign Section),

MANAGEMENT INFORMATION

Return on Assets Managed (ROAM)

THE assessment of performance of marketing managers is an area where little work has been carried out. All too often those techniques which have been introduced to measure such performance have concentrated almost exclusively upon the related revenues and costs, the ultimate measurement of success being the increase in net profit.

The reason for this concentration upon revenues and costs is the assumption that the decisions taken at such levels do not involve investments in fixed assets and are not, therefore, subject to normal investment criteria. As long as the increment in revenue exceeds the increment in costs, it makes a positive contribution to overall profits and is therefore desirable.

Effect of marketing decisions on investment

How valid, however, is the assumption that decisions taken by marketing managers do not involve the investment of a part of the company's funds? It is quite true that most cases will not involve investment of funds in fixed assets; but a decision to expand sales by, say, £100,000 in a particular way, will itself have an impact on the way in which the company's capital employed is distributed among the different assets.

An expansion in sales will almost inevitably lead to higher sums being locked up in debtors and stocks of goods, and these sums are as effectively invested in this way as they would be invested in plant and machinery. It could, in fact, be argued that in a sense they are more permanently invested in this way. An investment in plant and machinery is gradually reduced each year by the operation of depreciation charges until after a period of years the investment is reduced to nil. In the case of investments in working capital, however, this process does not take place and once the decision to invest has been made the amount invested remains constant until that decision is reversed.

The company's capital employed is invested in a range of assets, both fixed and current, and if we are to take as a criterion of success for the company the return it earns on its capital employed, then we must be concerned with all decisions at whatever level, or in whatever field of operations, which affect the investment of funds and be able to measure the return that will be earned on that investment.

Such an appraisal system is described by Messrs J. S. Schiff and Michael Schiff in an article entitled 'New sales management tool: ROAM' in the July/August issue of Harvard Business Review. The article describes the approach to the problem by Sylvania Electric Products Inc. and is of interest not only because of its appreciation of the importance of return on investment, but also because of the description of the business game approach which the company has adopted in training its managers in the technique.

ROAM is based upon the fact that the decisions of marketing managers to expand in a particular area, in particular products or to particular classes of customer, will have a direct influence upon the volume of funds invested in stocks and debtors. This effect on working capital must be taken into account in deciding which course of action to pursue. In the context of the marketing manager's decision, the overall assessment must be in the form of measuring the increment in earnings as a percentage of the increment in investment in working capital directly influenced by the decision. Hence the term 'return on assets managed', since it is basically looking at the effect on profit and assets which the manager himself controls.

As an illustration of the process of selection, assume that the marketing manager is considering efforts to expand sales and that this could be in either Area A or Area B. Cost of goods sold and marketing costs are the same in both areas. In Area A, however, it takes sixty days to collect debts and stock is turned over six times a year. In Area B it takes ninety days to collect debts, and stock is turned over five times a year. The comparison of the effects of these two decisions could then be set out in the following way:

Increment in sales	100,000	100,000
Cost of goods sold	65,000	65,000

Gross profit		35,000
Marketing expenses	25,000	25,000
Increment in profit	£10,000	£10,000

Incremental investment in working capital:

Debtors

Return on assets managed:

$$\frac{10,000 \times 100}{27,273} = 36.7 \text{ per cent}$$
 $\frac{10,000 \times 100}{37,660} = 26.6 \text{ per cent}$

Expansion of sales in Area A is considerably more attractive than expansion in Area B because of the lower investment required, and on the assumption that the effects of expanding sales in either area are the same as regards manufacturing investment, then priority should be given to the Area A proposal.

Clearly a return on assets approach to marketing decisions is getting closer to the return on capital concept for the business as a whole. This will provide management with a more precise tool with which to measure the consequences of its decisions, and a proper appreciation of the implications of their decisions will ensure that the actions of marketing managers conform more closely to the objectives of the business itself.

Accounting in Business Decisions – Theory, Method and Use

Second edition by H. A. BLACK, PH.D., C.P.A., J. E. CHAMPION, PH.D., C.P.A., and R. G. BROWN, PH.D., C.P.A.

Prentice-Hall International, London. 80s.

This massive book of nearly one thousand pages is a teaching book. It is written by three of the staff of the American Universities of Florida State and Stanford, and is written to emphasize the management uses of accounting.

Starting with a statement of objectives, the book deals with the measurement of the financial position and the income of a business, then expands these to the point of stating the results, measuring the flow of funds, and reporting and interpreting business results, with a number of examples from published accounts. The need for appraisal of results is discussed, again with actual published statements as illustrations, some used as the basis of classroom tests. The problems of individual businesses are considered and the special problems of stock control; the book then concentrates on the purpose which it has throughout insisted upon – the provision of good management through good accounting, including costing information.

Teachers of accounting will find this book full of practical examples of the highest order, not least in its use of real cases, and with the growth of teaching of this subject in colleges in a number of countries, it should achieve its aim elsewhere as well as in the United States.

Introduction to Managerial Economics

by C. I. SAVAGE and J. R. SMALL.

Hutchinson & Co (Publishers) Ltd, London. 12s 6d (paperback), 30s (hardback).

It is a commonplace that the modern businessman should be aware of the nature and the workings of economic forces, just as it is equally necessary for the economist to appreciate the complexities of decision-making in business. This newcomer to the market – already overloaded with limited texts – deserves a welcome from both these abovementioned classes of prospective reader.

The two authors, university teachers in economics and accounting respectively, have produced a blend of microeconomic theory, cost accounting, and some principles of operations research to create an excellent and realistic study of the background to decision-making in the modern economy. The authors' style is readable, even if the collective 'we' is occasionally irritating. The level of exposition is very good, though at times the quite rigorous argument involving some elementary algebra makes few concessions to the weaker student.

This book is strongly recommended to accounting students studying economics, to be read in conjunction with one of the standard texts. The very reasonable price at which the book is available is, of course, a distinct advantage to students.

Economic Accounting and Development Planning by Brian Van Arkadie and Charles R. Frank, Jun. Oxford University Press, London. 30s (paperback edition).

This text is based upon the lecture courses in economics given at Makerere College in the University of East Africa. It is a somewhat unusual approach, starting with the basis of the balance sheet and accounting records which form, in their turn, the basis for an extended treatment of input-output tables and their application to the economics of developing countries. The next part of the book explains the structure of the national income accounts for the East African economy and later chapters discuss economic planning and balance of payments problems.

This is a somewhat specialized book designed for a particular readership. It would, however, interest any young economist who is interested in the use of national income analysis for economic planning.

Capital Issues with Adjusted Stockmarket Prices for Capital Gains Tax Purposes 1965–66–67

Extel Statistical Services Ltd. £10 (including quarterly supplements).

Rationalization

THE 1966-67 accounts of Cavenham Foods Ltd, from which this week's reprint comes, show that the growing pains of rationalization, and also of considerable acquisition, were still very much with the organization when the accounts were made up. With the accounts, however, comes an interim report for the first thirty-two weeks of the current year showing that the group is moving towards a breakthrough, if not actually achieving a breakout, in earnings.

But more of that later. The Cavenham group is organized into four main divisions—confectionery, grocery and slimming foods, snuff and tobacco, and wholesale. During the past year an agreement was entered into with the French public company, Source Perrier S.A., which is Continental Europe's biggest manufacturer of soft drinks, accounting for about 55 per cent of the French market, and also has subsidiaries accounting for about 9 per cent of the French market for chocolate and confectionery.

The agreement with Perrier, says Mr James Goldsmith, Cavenham's chairman, lays the ground for the merger on the basis of an equal ownership between Perrier and Cavenham of the confectionery interests of both groups. Cavenham acquires 49 per cent of Compagnie Francaise de Confiserie, into which Perrier will put its confectionery interests, and will have an option to acquire a further 1 per cent. Perrier acquires 50 per cent of Cavenham Confectionery Ltd.

Overseas links

The first five years' profits of Compagnie Francaise de Confiserie, however, will be attributable to the Perrier Group and those of Cavenham Confectionery to Cavenham, with any losses in the first two years similarly borne. Combined turnover of the two companies is currently running at about £15 million a year. Carsons, Parkinson, Walters and Fillery are some of the main names in Cavenham Confectionery.

In the grocery and slimming foods division are Carr's biscuits, Yeatman groceries, and Slimcea, Procea and Nutrex slimming foods. Reorganization proved costly in the past year and in this division, also, there is an overseas link with The Harrell Corporation of Westport, Connecticut, to sell Carr's biscuits in America. Likewise, in the snuff and tobacco division, interests are now on an Anglo-American basis. The division was sold to a newly formed Swiss company, Conwood S.A., and 50 per cent of the Swiss company's shares are owned by Cavenham and 50 per cent by Conwood Corporation of Memphis, Tennessee. The price of the sale was £811,241 against a book value of £76,100, and of the surplus £35,633 was used to reduce goodwill.

In the wholesale division, Cavenham's Singleton & Cole subsidiary is one of the biggest wholesalers of tobacco and confectionery with a turnover of some £37 million a year. Changes in the wholesale trade have been considerable and whereas a few years ago there were as many as 3,500 wholesalers, there are now about 1,800. This rationalization trend is expected to continue and reorganization of Singleton & Cole, whose trading accounts for the major part of Cavenham's bank borrowing, is being pushed ahead.

Trade investments

The Singleton & Cole acquisition last year resulted in the issue of 2,966,566 new Cavenham 5s shares. The joint ventures in setting up the French and American participations as well as investments in confectionery buying trusts resulted in trade investments of £869,247, of which £800,000 is equally represented by 50 per cent of Cavenham Confectionery and 49 per cent of Compagnie Francaise de Confiserie. The losses of £974,423 before loan stock interest include losses on the sale of fixed assets, terminal losses in closing down certain factories, compensation payments for loss of office and abnormal costs of operating factories as a result of transferring production.

On the other hand, Cavenham made a profit of £699,508

On the other hand, Cavenham made a profit of £699,508 on the snuff and tobacco division sale and is the beneficiary of contributions amounting to £500,000. After merging the trading and reorganization loss and the interest payable on loan stock on one hand with non-recurring profits and contributions on the other, there was a surplus of £149,223.

A sum of £142,066 has been set aside towards possible future liabilities on the Source Perrier agreement. The accounts no longer reflect any reorganization or special expenditure which has not been provided for already.

The joint auditors, Spicer & Pegler and Price Waterhouse & Co, make the reservation in their report that they 'do not feel able to express an opinion' on the directors' statement, in Note 2 to the accounts, that the £950,243 attributed to goodwill is, by virtue of the board's valuation of the holding company's investment in subsidiaries, justified by the future prospects of the group.

Prospects

The figures of the interim report covering the first thirty-two weeks are included in the reprint and show a pre-tax surplus of £82,000 for the period. The figures are stated before preference dividend payment which, on a time apportionment basis, would amount to £32,000. In view of losses brought forward there will be no substantial taxation.

The results do not include any figures for Compagnie Francaise de Confiserie and shareholders are reminded that results of some subsidiaries and trade investments are of a seasonal nature and that interim figures should not necessarily be taken as a guide to the results for the year. 'Meaningful comparative figures are not available', the statement adds, and that is understandable in view of the extensive reorganization.

Mr Goldsmith, commenting on the thirty-two weeks' figures, says they demonstrate that the reorganization has to a large measure been completed and is beginning to produce the desired effects. The current year, he adds, will produce only a marginal return on both sales and capital investment. The board is confident, however, that the substantial improvement achieved will continue into next year and that 'the profits for the year beginning April 1st next will demonstrate that the concept which led to the formation of Cavenham in August 1965 was soundly based'.

(c) Conwood S.A.

During the year, Singleton & Cole Limited became a subsidiary at a total cost of £1,119,005. The business comprised two parts—soulf manufacture and tobacco importing on the one hand and wholesaling on the other. In March, 1967 agreement was reached to sell the snulf manufacture and tobacco importing part of the business for £811,44, the formalities being completed on 7th June, 1967.

The sale was made to Conwood S.A. a Swiss holding company, in which Cavenham Foods Limited has a 50 per cent. interest. As part of this transaction back loans amounting to £792,671 were made to Conwood S.A. for a term of two years and Cavenham has given a secondary guarantee as to the repayment of Swiss Francs 5.2 million of these loan.

Following this sale, the directors have revalued the remaining part of the investment in Singleton & Cole Limited at the amount of its net tangible assets and the resulting surplus of £699,508 has been taken to the credit of profit and loss account.

CITY NOTES

*ORECASTS for the stock-markets in 1968 have been more concerned with new growth than with too much growth in the past. Optimism invariably runs high in the first two weeks of any new year and the blanket assumption that, even though prices may drop later on, they will still stand higher in a year's time is the kind of comfort that shareholders like to have offered to them at a time of doubt.

The 1967 experience in the stock-market showed once again that even the worst of economic experience can, and does, have the best effect on stock-markets. The total failure of the Government's economic policy and the enforcement of devaluation combined to set up circumstances inducing the buying not only of industrial equities but of metal and commodity shares.

There is considerable scope for bad cause and good effect in the equity market this year. Inadequate Government expenditure cuts and misguided Government economic measures will bring back the anti-inflation buyers of equities to the market. On the other hand, strong action may have an immediately salutary effect on prices but will later bring investment demand to the market on an anticipated recovery basis. On economic counts, therefore, there are the makings of firm equity markets on balance over 1968, although without the 1967 performance being repeated.

ANOTHER factor undoubtedly stiffening the equity sections of the stock-market in 1967 and likely to do so again in 1968 is the volume of take-over and merger business. It is estimated that £1,000 million was involved in take-over and merger deals last year and it is even being suggested in some quarters that the figure will be bigger still in 1968. Certainly the urge to merge is considerable and a flying start to this year's merger movement is likely to come in the Martins Bank merger operation. The English Electric-I.C.T. merger is another much-forecast deal which is expected to be confirmed during the early part of this year. If the take-over factor does prove as strong as the forecasters predict, then this is obviously another item that can be put to the optimistic side of the equity market's

It is even possible for the forecasters to translate home political uncertainties favourably. They can argue that, if the Government proves inadequate in dealing with the present economic situation, there will be a Government fall and a General Election before the end of the year. That, assuming a Conservative landslide, would put share prices better. Conversely, if the Government proves adequate to the present economic situation then the prospect of an improving economy, and of eventually easier conditions in 1969, should see prices rising.

HESE are the bases on which optimistic assessments of 1968 stock-market performance are currently being made. It should be pointed out that at this time last year the equity market stood around the 300 level in terms of The Financial Times Share Index and was considered to be in danger of going ahead too quickly. In fact last spring, when the same Index stood in the 340 region, it was considered 20 points too high. Now, with the balance of payments probably at its worst since 1964 and Central Bank and International Monetary Fund loans at their highest, and the Index hovering around 400, stock-market forecasters can still feel optimistic. Nothing brings Stock Exchange optimism more than rising prices and nothing more than rising prices at the beginning of the New Year.

Taxation Cases

Full reports of the cases summarized in these columns will be published, with Notes on the Judgments, in the 'Annotated Tax Cases'

Scaffolding (Great Britain) Limited v. Minister of Labour

Selective employment tax – Refund – Premium – Scaffolding contract work – Scaffolds erected to orders of building contractors – Whether contractors' plant – Whether manufacture of scaffolds – Whether hiring of scaffolding – Selective Employment Payments Act 1966, section I – Standard Industrial Classification, Minimum List Headings 336, 499 (2), 500, 899 (9).

The company carried on the business of (inter alia) scaffolding contract work, in which the company provided and erected scaffolds enabling building contractors to carry out their construction work. The company also dismantled the scaffolding.

The company claimed to be entitled to repayment of tax, and to a premium, on the ground that scaffolding contract work was within minimum list headings 336 or 499 (2). The Minister of Labour contended that the work was within heading 500 (hiring of contractors' plant and scaffolding), or heading 899 (9) (all other services not elsewhere specified).

The Industrial Tribunal decided that the work was not the hiring of scaffolding because the completed article was a scaffold and not scaffolding; that it was not the manufacture of a scaffold; but was within the general operation of construction.

Held: the work was the hiring of scaffolding.

Westward Television Limited v. Hart

(Before Mr Justice PENNYCUICK)

Income tax – Loss – Carry-forward – Loss in first year – Computation for second year on same loss reduced by part of subsequent profit – Whether that sum goes to reduce amount carried forward – Finance Act 1936, section 33 – Income Tax Act 1962, sections 127, 128, 155, 342.

The company commenced to trade on August 1st, 1960, and for the accounting period from that date to April 28th, 1961, it made a loss of £132,107. For the accounting period from April 29th, 1961, to April 30th, 1962, there was a profit of £165,572, and there were profits in the next two periods. The tax computation for 1960-61 consisted of the loss of £132,107 less the proportion apportionable to the three weeks, April 6th, 1961, to April 28th, 1961.

The computation for 1961-62 (based upon the twelve months ended July 31st, 1961) consisted of the same loss and a part of the profit of the period from April 29th, 1961, to April 30th, 1962. This part was one-quarter, £41,263, and the computed loss for 1961-62 was therefore £90,844. The computation for 1962-63 was the same.

The company claimed to be entitled to carry forward the loss of £132,107 against profits of future years as computed for tax purposes. For the Inland Revenue it was contended that not all the £132,107 (reduced by other reliefs to £101,214) could be carried forward, but only the latter amount less the £41,263 of profit which entered into the computation for 1961-62 and less the same sum which entered into the computation for 1962-63. The Special Commissioners decided that the case was covered by the decision in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Scott Adamson, and they therefore upheld the restriction of the claim for 1965-66 to £29,640.

Held: the decision of the Special Commissioners, based on the decision in that case, was correct.

Rose & Co (Wallpaper and Paints) Limited v. Campbell

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)

(Before Mr Justice PENNYCUICK)

Income tax – Investment allowance – Pattern books – Replaced after four years – Useful life of two years – Some books issued to representatives and contractors – others used in branches and depots of business – Insurance against loss of books – Whether cost of books capital expenditure – Finance Act 1954, section 16.

The company carried on business as a paint and wall-paper retailer. The company purchased samples of wallpaper, and had them printed and bound into about six thousand books. The preparation and use of the pattern books extended over four calendar years, but they were in full use only in the second and third years. In the fourth year there were sales in January and February, when the pattern books were replaced by new ones, and the stocks of wallpaper not included in the new books were disposed of.

The pattern books were issued under the company's trade name to its representatives and to contractors, and some were in use in the company's branches and depots. They remained the company's property. In 1962 the expenditure on pattern books was £15,703. Each book cost about £3. The books were insured, and the insurance covered loss of profits due to the books not being available. It was contended for the company that the pattern books were plant used in the business; that the expenditure incurred in producing them was capital expenditure; and that the company was entitled to an investment allowance for the expenditure. For the Revenue it was contended that the pattern books were not plant; and that the expenditure on them was revenue expenditure. The General Commissioners decided in favour of the revenue.

Held: the General Commissioners' decision was correct.

(Before Mr Justice Pennycuick)

Income tax - Partnership change - Agreement with service company - Amount chargeable for services during twelve months from date of change - Income Tax Act 1952, sections 127, 128, 155 - Finance Act 1953, section 19.

On October 29th, 1960, there was a change in the respondents' firm of chartered accountants, because of the death of a partner, and the firm had to be treated, pursuant to section 19 (1) of the Finance Act 1953, for tax purposes as though a new profession had been set up on that day. The firm's accounting period ended on November 30th. Towards the end of 1960 the partners arranged for staff, light, heat, water and fittings to be provided by a company (the service company), and for the company to act as secretary, registrar and executor on behalf of the firm's clients. The service company's first accounting period ran from December 1st, 1960 to May 31st, 1962. The partners in the firm were the only shareholders, and they were also the directors.

It had been arranged at the beginning that the service company should charge for its services, but it was not until the summer of 1962 that an agreement was made whereby the charge for the accounting period ended November 30th, 1961 was fixed at £47,000. This amount was agreed on the understanding that the charge for later years was to be adjusted so as to secure for the service company, over the long term, only a nominal profit. The cost of the services for the period just mentioned was about £32,000, so that there was a gross profit of £15,000 to the service company for that period. The £47,000 was a commercially reasonable sum to charge for the services costing $f_{32,000}$, and the firm got value for the £47,000. The charge for the next accounting period was agreed at £21,000.

The accounts of the service company for its accounting period ended May 31st, 1962 contained a credit of £48,000 for the service charge, and of that amount £47,000 was debited in the firm's accounts for the period ended November 30th, 1961. The balance of £1,000 was part of the £21,000 agreed for the period ended November 30th, 1962, and it represented much less than the value of the services provided in the period from December 1st, 1961 to May

It was contended for the firm that the $f_{47,000}$ had been wholly and exclusively incurred for the purposes of their profession, and was deductible in computing their profit for the period to November 30th, 1961. It was contended for the Revenue that the decision to pay the £47,000 was not made on either a commercial or a contractual basis; and that no more than £32,000 was deductible in computing the profit of the firm for the period in question. The General Commissioners decided in favour of the firm.

The Revenue gave notice of a new contention that the £47,000 was paid partly in consideration of the undertaking given by the service company to supply services in subsequent periods for £15,000 less than the amount which would enable it to earn a nominal profit; and that therefore the £15,000 was not deductible, or if deductible, the firm's accounts should be credited with £15,000 or thereabouts, the value of the firm's right to a discount on further services by the service company.

Held: although the £47,000 had been wholly and exclusively expended for the purposes of the firm's profession, it had not all been expended in the period ended November 30th, 1961; and that only £32,000 could be attributed to that period.

Taxpayer's Traditional Right

SIR, - When a taxpayer is called to the tax office by the Inspector of Taxes to discuss whether there has been any underpayment of income tax in the past, is the inspector obliged to remind the taxpayer that he has a traditional right to be accompanied by an accountant or a lawyer if he wishes to do so. I shall be obliged if any of your readers can cite a legal decision on this matter.

Yours faithfully,

EAKEBEE.

Mergers and Rationalization Schemes

SIR, - Mr C. A. Perry (December 9th issue) implies that the Industrial Reorganization Corporation is the only body in this country to which businessmen can turn when seeking to achieve growth or rationalization through mergers. This is not the case.

There are several well-known organizations who set out to help businesses conclude suitable mergers, and who act as intermediaries in promoting, introducing and negotiating schemes where sound commercial benefits will result. An example is Industrial Mergers Ltd, a subsidiary of the Industrial and Commercial Finance Corporation. We specifically try to assist medium and small businesses and have the details of the merger requirements of 500 companies.

With the generally recognized need to speed up the process of change and modernization of Britain's industrial structure, we believe that specialists in the field of rationalization and mergers have a worthwhile role to play.

Yours faithfully,

E. R. IZOD Manager, INDUSTRIAL MERGERS LTD.

Continuous Analysis System

A USEFUL loose-leaf continuous analysis system, known as Contalysis, has been developed and patented by Matrix Systems of London. Its two main advantages are, first that the carrying forward of column totals and headings is automatic and, secondly, that it provides a comprehensive ruling system in practically any combination up to thirty-six columns from only thirteen sheet rulings and two binders – fifteen stock items in all. Where more than one binder is in use, binder selection is facilitated by colour-coded spine labels.

As shown in the illustration below, a carbon strip is inserted so that the page totals can be carboned through to the bottom of their own page and at the same time they provide the 'carry forwards' on the fold, which in turn becomes the top of the following page. The fact that carrying forward is automatic means that carry-forward errors and the auditor's need to tick forward are eliminated, a saving of valuable time. In fact, say the makers, if time is valued at £1 per hour, the time cost saved on a thirty-six column binder will be at least £56. The prices of both the sets of seventy sheets and the small binder, the Mini-Matrix, are 18s 11d, whilst the price of the large binder, the MajorMatrix, is exactly double at 37s 10d.

Electronic Stencil Cutter

A FASTER version of the Roneotronic stencil cutter is now being made available called the '400V'. This is stated to operate at twice the speed of existing models of electronic stencil cutters, and will therefore cut a stencil in half the time.

Depending on the size and complexity of the original, cutting time is now reduced to from three to seven minutes, and from this stencil several hundred – possibly 1,000 or more – copies may be run off. This new model also has the facility of producing one-off copies on a sensitized paper if required.

New features also include a special shield which is locked in position when the machine is running and completely covers the revolving cylinder. Also a 'flip-up' meter enables the operator to read the instrument panel at a glance when setting the controls. The '400V' is quieter than its predecessor and has a more efficient ventilation/extraction system to remove any fumes caused in the cutting operation.

Basic price for the machine is £415; in addition it can be fitted with special colour filters at the time of purchase for £11, or at a later date for £21. (These filters are used to separate colours in originals to produce primary coloured stencils for printing in yellow, magenta (red), and cyan (blue). Using special trichromatic inks with a Roneo duplicator, the coloured results are claimed to be of excellent quality).

To enable suites to be assembled around and based upon these desks, wardrobes, coffee tables, umbrella stands and cabinets are offered in matching finishes and woods. Complementing all the furniture is an extensive selection of chairs, and also there is unit seating, and easy chairs and settees.

The 5704 executive desk measures 72 by 36 in., and is constructed primarily of teak with a veneer inset top. The left-hand pedestal contains a filing drawer and the right-hand pedestal two drawers. The lower one is fitted with an internal half-sliding tray. Locks can be fitted to both pedestals. The legs of the desk are in polished satin chrome.

The 5716 desk is of traditional design for the more conservative executive. Made of mahogany, it has a hide inset top that measures 66 by 33 in. Each pedestal has four drawers with handles suitable to the style, and a long drawer above the knee-hole.

Speed-up in Computer Deliveries

THE pace of computer deliveries to British industry and commerce is speeding up as new computer manufacturing facilities come on stream. Early last month the first computer produced at the new Winsford, Cheshire, factory of English Electric Computers Ltd, was delivered to the municipal offices of Leicester Corporation, and over the Christmas period two other English Electric System 4–50 computers were delivered for installation.

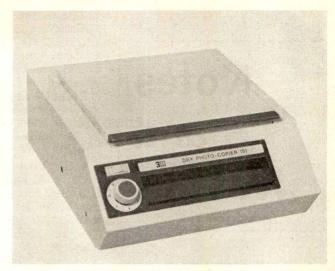

One of these machines is being installed for University College, Cardiff, in the old B.B.C. buildings in Park Place which have been extensively altered to accommodate the new machine. There it will form the basis of a new computing centre being established by University College for scientific research and teaching. It will also be used in the day-to-day administrative work of the college.

The second machine was delivered on site at midnight on Saturday, December 23rd, to save as much disruption of traffic as possible, as the building which will house the computer – the Edinburgh City Chamberlain's department – is situated in Edinburgh's historic Royal Mile. The computer will be used by Edinburgh Corporation for traffic surveys and accounting, including rents collection, housing loans, payments to suppliers, wages and salaries.

Profits of overseas branches and subsidiaries are included and those of resident branches and subsidiaries of overseas parents are excluded. CITY FIRM'S SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY

Messrs W. H. Payne & Co, Chartered Accountants, of Dashwood House, 69 Old Broad Street, London EC2, celebrated the seventy-fifth anniversary of the founding of the firm with a dinner on December 15th at Browns Hotel, London. The senior partner, Mr Warwick G. Payne, F.C.A., presided.

The founder of the firm, the late William Henry Payne, was born in Birmingham and was educated at King Edward's School, Birmingham. He moved to London in 1883 and entered the office of Cooper Brothers after a period of four years with a firm of solicitors. Admitted to membership of the former Society of Incorporated Accountants in 1891, Mr Payne in the following year commenced to practise under the firm's present style. He took an active part in the affairs of the Society, helping to form the Incorporated Accountants Students' Society and serving as its President in 1896, and later was a member of the Council of the Society for a number of years.

In 1905 he was joined by Mr M. J. Faulks, M.A., F.C.A., who retired as consultant to the firm in 1965. Just fifty years ago, two of the founder's sons joined the firm, Mr Stuart F. Payne and Mr Warwick G. Payne. It is of interest to note that at the time of Mr W. H. Payne's death in 1936, three who had then entered the firm are still with the firm now: they are Mr O. B. Gatward, F.C.A., who joined in 1922, Mr W. J. Braine, F.C.A., who joined in 1924 – both are now partners in the firm – and Miss M. Knight who has been a member of the staff since 1932.

C. S. DEVERELL

M.A., B.SC.(ECON.), B.COM., F.C.I.S., A.M.B.I.M.

Head of the Department of Management Studies
Letchworth College of Technology

Between 1951 and 1965 in nearly every year more than 20 per cent of young people went into clerical work. This is one of the cogent reasons for reviewing the management of our offices and the men and women who staff them.

Are our offices as effective as they could be? What is the real cost of providing office services? What is the calibre of the newcomers? How does one select them? How are they trained? What job satisfactions do they get? How can ability be recognized and rewarded?

The coming into force of the Offices, Shops and Railway Premises Act 1963 has led to a re-examination of working conditions. The implementation of the Industrial Training Act 1964 is likely to become an important issue. The selective employment tax has reinforced the need to examine costs and efficiency. Similarly, the tempo of the revolution in the quality and quantity of information data and its processing poses equally urgent questions.

Here is a book which reviews all these problems. The author writes from a background of many years in offices and as many in professional, commercial and office education. Above all, he is concerned with the human beings at the desk and the machine.

His book will provide managerial and supervisory staff with stimulating leads on the human side of office management. Students preparing for the examinations of The Chartered Institute of Secretaries, The Institute of Office Management, The Corporation of Secretaries, The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants, and the relevant subjects of business or management diplomas in colleges will find that it contains a wealth of information attractively introduced. It is a book for the library of every training and personnel department and it complements the same author's Business Administration and Management.

Plain Man's Audit Reports

ON the principle that no news is good news, the briefer the auditor's report – the better should the directors and shareholders of the company whose accounts are being reported on be pleased. Brevity in this instance means that the accounts have been drawn up in accordance with the requirements of the Companies Act and that the auditor is satisfied that there is nothing unusual or irregular in them on which he feels bound to comment.

But – because company legislation is in a state of transition at present – the question arises, which Companies Act? All accounts prepared for accounting periods ending on and after January 27th, 1968, must comply with the requirements of the 1967 Act and auditors will be obliged to conform to section 14 of that Act which defines their rights and duties. But what about accounts drawn up for periods prior to January 27th, 1968, and reported on by the auditor after that date? In a statement reproduced elsewhere in this issue, the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales suggests that, on information received from the Board of Trade, no reference need be made to the 1967 Act.

Although the Council does not say so, presumably this is intended to cover instances where none or only some of the new requirements under that Act have been incorporated. If all the new requirements have been gratuitously incorporated, then it would seem logical to say that the accounts were in accordance with both the 1948 and 1967 Acts, even if statutorily the company had, as it were, taken time by the forelock. New legislation should be a challenge to accountants and company secretaries and if they show commendable awareness by anticipating improvements designed to make their company's accounts more informative to shareholders and investors, then their initiative should be officially recognized.

The Council, in its statement, gives a number of specimen audit reports with variations to meet particular circumstances. These have been drafted with the express intention of making the language of the auditor more intelligible to the layman. Such well-known phrases as 'proper books of account having been kept' and the accounts 'being in agreement' with these books have been eliminated on the reasonable assumption that the auditor will make reference only if these conditions, in his opinion, have not been satisfactorily observed. Another suggestion which the Council makes is that, where possible, the documents to which the auditor's report relates should be clearly identified by reference to page numbers.

Careers and Pay

THE observation that the grass is always greener on the other side of the fence finds substantial support from a survey on career satisfaction carried out among a cross-section of industrial executives enrolled in the Graduate Appointments Register during 1967. Half of the respondents to the inquiry stated that they would have chosen a different career if they had been able to go back and start again. While due caution is needed in assessing the validity of these findings, not least since only just over a quarter of the non-random group of executives responded to the inquiry, the results are thought-provoking.

A comparison between the satisfaction from the present occupation and the retrospective career preference, i.e. the career which the executive now believes is most preferable, is illuminating. Whereas 7 per cent of the respondents were in accountancy, 11 per cent of the sample expressed a retrospective preference for that profession. The law, represented by 2 per cent of the respondents, attracted a 9 per cent retrospective preference. Table 1 shows some contrasting figures which, as the report observes, suggests that some occupations have a poor 'image' – in particular, engineering and sales, and more alarmingly, research and development as well as technological work.

The contrast between Table 1 and Table 2 is striking. Table 2 shows the proportions of respondent classified by occupation who were 'very' or 'fairly' satisfied in their current occupation. Note, in particular, the position of accountancy with only 55 per cent of respondent accountants expressing satisfaction. This contrasts starkly with the image of the profession reflected by the figures in Table 1 yet, as the report reasonably observes, 'Accountants are thought by many to run British industry nowadays and to command high rewards as a result. But those actually involved in the detail of historical accounting may take a poorer view of the way they spend their time.'

One of the most striking findings from the survey affecting the accountancy profession is the fact that the proportion of respondents in each occupational group who prior to entry, to quote the report, had 'fully explored' the nature and prospects of the various occupations, was highest among the accountants. Over two-thirds, i.e. 68 per cent, had explored thoroughly the prospects and felt themselves suited to the work, compared with only 28 per cent in teaching and 12 per cent in social work. The report concludes from these figures that the professions which were easier to enter were the least thoroughly explored.

Certainly, judging by the considerable data on salaries in the report, part of which is reproduced in Table 3, accountants tend to receive their due rewards for the long period of training and study. The median financial accountant's salary in the middle age group of 31-35 years is £2,200. This is exceeded by the cost accountants with £2,250. It is in excess of what comparable executives in other occupations – e.g. chemical and civil engineers, company secretaries, economists and mathematicians – receive.

In this context what is perhaps not altogether surprising is that the occupations offering the highest career satisfactions, e.g. personnel management, management consultancy and computing, tend on the whole to offer lower rewards than those obtained by accountants.

It would seem, therefore, that there is more than a little truth in the old adage about the grass over the fence!

Forms of Auditors' Reports

Under the Companies Act 1967

The Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales has issued the following statement for the guidance of members on the form of auditors' reports appropriate for use by members in the light of section 14 of the Companies Act 1967. The statement does not deal with the circumstances in which it is deemed necessary to introduce qualifications into the report; in such cases reference should be made to the Council's Statement on Auditing U6: QUALIFICATIONS IN AUDITORS' REPORTS.

Introduction

SECTION 14 of the Companies Act 1967, which relates to auditors' rights and duties, takes effect on January 27th, 1968, and auditors' reports which are made on or after that date must comply with the requirements of that section (but see paragraph 10 below).

- 2. Auditors are required to state whether in their opinion the accounts on which they are reporting give a true and fair view and otherwise comply with the requirements of the Companies Acts. If they are unable to report affirmatively in the required respects they must say so.
- 3. Section 14 (4) requires the auditors in preparing their report:

'to carry out such investigations as will enable them to form an opinion as to the following matters, that is to

(a) whether proper books of account have been kept by the company and proper returns adequate for their audit have been received from branches not visited by them; and

'(b) whether the company's balance sheet and (unless it is framed as a consolidated profit and loss account) profit and loss account are in agreement with the books of account and returns.'

If as a result of their investigations the auditors are of opinion that these requirements have not been complied with or if they 'fail to obtain all the information and explanations which to the best of their knowledge and belief are necessary for the purposes of their audit', they are required to state these facts in their report.

4. Accordingly, statements dealing with the matters set out in paragraph 3 above are necessary only if the auditors are dissatisfied with respect to them. The auditors' duties are therefore similar to those in connection with the disclosure of certain emoluments and loans under sections 196 and 197 of the Companies Act 1948 and sections 6 to 8 of the Companies Act 1967. The absence of references to any of these matters in the report is equivalent to positive statements by the auditors that they are satisfied with respect to them.

Form of Audit Report

5. In the absence of any qualifications the forms of auditors' report in respect of accounts for periods ending on or after January 27th, 1968 (i.e. those to which disclosure provisions of the Companies Act 1967 apply), set out in the next paragraph are considered appropriate by the Council. The special circumstances applicable to an auditors' report made on or after January 27th, 1968, on accounts ending before that date are dealt with in paragraph 10 pelow. The notes referred to in paragraphs 6, 7 and 8 deal with variations to suit particular circumstances and are set out in paragraph 9 below.

6. Companies not submitting group accounts.

Auditors' report to the members of . .

(See note (a)). In our opinion, the accounts set out on pages ... to ... (see note (b)) give a true tnd fair view of the state of the company's affairs at . . . and of its profit (or loss) (see note (c)) for the year ended on that date and comply with the Companies Acts 1948 and 1967:

7. Companies submitting group accounts.

Auditors' report to the members of . . .

(See note (a)). In our opinion, the accounts set out on pages ... to (see note (b)) together give, so far as concerns members of the holding company, a true and fair view of the state of affairs at ... and of the profit (or loss) (see note (c)) for the year ended on that date and comply with the Companies Acts 1948 and 1967. (See note (d).)

8. Banking, Discount, Insurance and Shipping Companies.

In the case of a company which is entitled to avail itself and has availed itself of any of the provisions of Part III of Schedule 2 to the Companes Act 1967, the auditors are not required to report, whether in their opinion, the accounts give a true and fair view. This dispensation, however, applies only to the consequences of the exemptions from disclosure which are permitted by Part III and does not extend to other matters (for example the overstatement of assets or the omission of liabilities) which, in the auditors' opinion, prevent the disclosure of a true and fair view in the generally accepted sense. In the absence of qualifications the following form of auditors' report is considered appropriate by the Council:

Auditors' report to the members of the Bank (or the Insurance Co etc.)

(See note (a)). In our opinion, the accounts set out on pages to (see note (b)) comply with the provisions of the Companies Acts 1948 and 1967 applicable to (banking or insurance etc.) companies.

Notes of variations to suit particular circumstances

- 9. The following are the notes referred to in the forms of audit report set out in paragraphs 6-8 above:
 - (a) If it is desired to refer to the auditors' examination, each of the forms of auditors' report may appropriately commence as follows:

'We have examined the accounts set out in pages to and report that, in our opinion, they'

(b) The documents to which the auditors' report relates should be clearly identified by reference to the page numbers, or if the pages are not numbered, the word 'accounts' should be replaced by a description, e.g. 'the annexed balance sheet, profit and loss account and notes'. If it is necessary for the auditors to make reference to information included in the directors' report (for example, if the directors have taken advantage of the proviso to section 163 of the Companies Act 1948 to include in their report certain matters

- which the Act requires to be included in the accounts), the auditors' report should clearly specify the paragraphs of the directors' report which fall within its scope.
- (c) In certain circumstances, for example where the consolidated accounts disclose a profit but the holding company incurs a loss, it may be convenient to use the word 'results'.
- (d) If the consolidated accounts incorporate the accounts of material subsidiaries which the auditors of the holding company have not themselves audited, it is usually desirable for them to include a reference to the fact in their report for the information of the members. This may be done by adding an appropriate sentence at the end of the report set out in paragraph 7 above. (See the Council's Statement on Auditing U5: Auditors' Reports on Group Accounts.)

Auditors' reports made on or after January 27th, 1968, on accounts for periods ending before that date

10. The detailed disclosure requirements of the Companies Act 1967 do not apply to accounting periods which end before January 27th, 1968, and it is therefore probable that many companies will (as the law permits) draw up their accounts for such periods in accordance with the unamended provisions of the Companies Act 1948. The Council has been informed by the Board of Trade that, in these circumstances, no objection will be raised if the auditors' report omits the reference to the Companies Act 1967.

More New Year Honours

IN last week's issue we gave (just before going to press) the names of members of the profession who appeared in the New Year Honours List.

We have since learned that the C.B.E. has also been awarded to Mr J. M. A. Smith, F.C.A., Chairman, National Computing Centre, and that the O.B.E. has been awarded to Mr G. S. Davies, F.C.A., deputy principal accountant, Ministry of Defence (Royal Navy).

Backing Britain

OME of the consequences of devaluation are Calready coming home to roost. Announcements of a large number of increases in food prices and manufacturing costs have been made public. There is, of course, no single factor that can be blamed: higher materials costs merge with higher labour costs, service charges and so forth. The question is whether this is inevitable or whether, at least to some extent, the rate of increase can be held back. For example, The Accountant, faced with higher production costs of the order of 7 to 8 per cent in the coming year – due to rises in the price of materials, together with the recent pay award in the printing industry - could simply pass on the increased costs in higher subscription and advertisement rates. This year, however, it is not proposed to do this. Instead, the higher costs will be absorbed and, it is hoped, be offset partly by greater efficiency at all stages of production.

It is in this context that the 'Back Britain' campaign has most to offer. It is, of course, easy to poke fun at the campaign and to criticize by pseudo-economic arguments the fallacy of additional overtime.

Ideally, similar results could be achieved if all increased their efforts during the existing working week rather than adding a daily half an hour thereto. It would be idle to pretend that this is impracticable. The plain fact of the matter is that increased effort accompanied by increased output for the same cost must benefit the national economy.

Without putting too fine a point on it, one of the factors which has forced devaluation upon us is that output during the working week is inadequate. More than ever what is needed throughout the ranks of British labour and management is increased effort. If the 'Back Britain' campaign can generate a spirit whereby this effort is made, then the five young typists from Surbiton will have earned the nation's thanks.

Resignation from the Council of the Institute

THE resignation of Mr E. N. Macdonald, D.F.C., F.C.A., from the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales was received with regret at a meeting of the Council on Wednesday of last week (reported on other pages in this issue).

Senior partner in Chalmers, Impey & Co, Chartered Accountants, of Liverpool, Mr Macdonald was elected to the Council in June 1960, and has served on the Disciplinary, District Societies, Courses and Technical Committees, being Vice-Chairman of the last named from June 1965 to June 1967. He became a member of the Institute's Taxation and Research Committee in 1947, was Chairman of its Taxation Subcommittee from 1956 to 1958 and Chairman of the Committee from 1958 to 1959.

Mr Macdonald was President of the Liverpool Society of Chartered Accountants in 1955-56, the year when the Liverpool Society acted as hosts for the Autumn Meeting of the Institute at Southport.

Business Equipment Exhibitions in 1968

THE Business Equipment Trades Association (BETA) representing most United Kingdom manufacturers of office machinery has announced that it has planned a number of home and overseas exhibitions and trade fairs in 1968.

In the spring the Association is sponsoring joint British stands at the Lyons International Fair and at the Hanover Fair, and in October, it will be organizing the National Business Efficiency Exhibition at Olympia, London. The Association will not be organizing any United Kingdom provincial exhibitions this year. Over twenty of its members, however, will take part in the exhibition being held in conjunction with the International Federation for Information Processing (IFIP) Congress in Edinburgh from August 5th to 10th.

The Lyons International Trade Fair, which lasts from March 23rd to April 1st, will be the second year that BETA, in co-operation with the Board of Trade, has arranged a joint stand to show British office equipment. The Hanover Fair, which is being held from April 27th to May 5th, will also see a combined British stand for the second year running in its office equipment section. This year's London Business Efficiency Exhibition will occupy the Grand and the National Halls at Olympia from September 30th to October 9th, when over two hundred manufacturers are expected to display their equipment.

O.E.C.D. View of U.K. Economy

DEVALUATION, comments the current issue of the O.E.C.D. Economic Outlook, 'has given U.K. manufacturers a net cost advantage of the order of roper cent. On any normal assumption about the response of trade to cost and price changes, the benefit to the trade account should be substantial and could, over time, even exceed the Government's target of an improvement of £500 million'. Gratifying though these assurances are, there is no doubt that such an improvement is far from being the automatic result of devaluation.

Opportunities apart, the present situation also contains dangers for the U.K. economy. Thus, observes the O.E.C.D. journal, 'unless domestic demand is severely restrained (our italics), over-heating could develop, pushing up incomes and prices and soon cancelling out the competitive advantage obtained by devaluation'. In short, the restrictive measures taken in November at the same time as the devaluation will need 'to be followed, by the time of the Budget, by further substantial measures of restraint if this purpose is to be achieved'.

The journal points out that the devaluations in Britain and elsewhere will affect substantially the economies of other O.E.C.D. member countries. It estimates that the effect may be to worsen the nondevaluing countries' current balances by about 11/4 to 11/2 billion dollars over the next eighteen months. While this sum is not of itself large in relation to the aggregate trade of the member countries, its incidence is not likely to be evenly spread between them. Hence, some countries may well be pushed into deficit and, if this happened, it would compel many Governments to cut back domestic demand and thereby emphasize the inadequacy of the world's currency reserves. The significance of these observations is strengthened by the probable consequences of the American Government's latest proposals to improve the U.S. trade balance.

The prevailing high level of interest rates in both the U.K. and the U.S.A. is appropriate to the state of their economies, just as in the surplus countries in Europe there is a need for interest rates to keep low. Fortunately, even before the devaluation there were clear signs of improvement in the state of the major European economies, just as there has been a gradual pick-up in North America and Japan. The present recovery should, considers the journal, gain momentum during 1968 when the O.E.C.D. area as a whole should achieve a growth rate of 4 to $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. One

Company Mergers

THE first experiment of a university taking an actual interest in the subject of mergers and acquisitions took place in Glasgow on March 20th and 21st last year when a national conference was organized by the University of Strathclyde in co-operation with The Financial Times. The proceedings have now been edited by Mr R. V. Arnfield, B.sc., and reproduced in booklet form by the University.

In addition to the opening address by The Rt Hon. Lord Polwarth, c.a., the booklet contains the twelve papers presented at the conference, each examining a particular theme or aspect of the subject. In the first paper on 'The economic background', Professor K. J. W. Alexander pointed out that although the case for striving for the economics of scale was well-founded this in no way pronounced upon the efficiency of management in smaller firms. It simply meant that the cards were stacked against them in many cases, however energetic and capable they might be.

After Mr Nicholas A. H. Stacey had dealt with 'The trend in company acquisitions', the floor was taken by

by An Industrious Accountant

THE board meeting was over. The air was thick with cigarette smoke and bad temper; crumpled papers, scrawled and doodled, lay scattered over the table; the directors were departing sulkily. For the first time in nearly three hours I could relax.

The chairman, the last to move, gave me a half-tired, half-mischievous smile as he gathered up his notes. 'Not perhaps our finest hour, I fancy,' he murmured conspiratorily. 'No mention in dispatches for that effort, dammit.'

His comment was something of an understatement. The level of debate had been deplorable. Unintelligent, unreasoning, ill-tempered, autocratic and incoherent, were not wildly inappropriate adjectives. I could hardly advise the chairman that the standard was not up to what I would desire, however, so I admitted with a touch of hauteur that the minutes of the discussion at least would be beyond reproach.

It was really the chairman's own fault. The debate on item five on the agenda, 'decreased turnover', had, for obvious reasons, been acrimonious. Corns had been trodden on and sores probed, while stones previously undisturbed had been turned and then turned again. Towards the end of the discussion the deputy-chairman had blazed off indiscriminately.

Too many orders were being mislaid, he said. Several customers had complained that they had received neither acknowledgement nor delivery after writing to us. Where the hell were their letters going? Our system must be so-and-so inefficient!

The problem wasn't new, of course. In an oldestablished business like ours, long-standing customers tend to drop personal notes to staff members who are old friends, asking them to get this or that item for them. It's due partly to a feeling that the staff member will get credit for the sale, and partly to the human tendency to approach a known individual rather than a faceless machine. Unfortunately these letters do occasionally go astray.

When old Michael in Woollens was suffering from his incipient appendicitis he put several such personal letters aside for special attention and they weren't discovered for three weeks. Dave in Wines and Spirits, due to the Christmas rush and conviviality, lost, among others, Lady M's entire Christmas order. Penelope in Perfumes blissfully receiving letters of congratulations on her engagement, never noticed that seven of them included orders.

Private letters, the chairman had grumbled, shouldn't be sent to business houses. All letters received in the office, growled his deputy, should be opened unless they were marked 'confidential'; the staff had no right to treat the stores like a post-office. The managing director said sarcastically that the suggestion was impractical. Had they ever seen the amount of mail in the in-coming post-bags? Three-quarters of it was addressed to individual directors or buyers or particular departments, which materially assisted distribution. Dash it all, be reasonable!

Somehow the D.C., guiltily conscious of the arrogance of his suggestion, became heated and pressed his point – supported by the chairman with a crusty pomposity derived from his authoritarian upbringing. His subconscious inclination is always to turn the clock back, although he really knows better.

Prinny then intervened with a lurid prophecy of a walk-out and rather vague allusions to human dignity and the rights of man. The D.C. stubbornly continued to demand a veto on personal letters and Prinny, with an uncalled-for look at me, said we'd slipped up in not marking our stationery to the effect that 'All correspondence must be addressed to the company, not to individuals'. I said I'd hate to have the local newspapers get wind of this particular suggestion and the incensed M.D. said something unprintable about newspapers. In short, it was a shambles.

It was just as well that the approach of lunchtime gave them an opportunity to adjourn with dignity, with a somewhat sheepish resolve that they'd thrash it out properly another time. three merchant bankers who drew freely upon their practical experience covering bidding strategies, defensive strategies and financing company acquisitions. The public interest was ably reviewed by Mr P. W. Carey, Assistant Secretary, Board of Trade, who harked back to the I.C.I./Courtaulds affair three years ago in order to show how powerless the Government was at the time. He pointed out that the Monopolies and Mergers Act 1965 was subsequently introduced to 'put an end to irresolution and impotence'.

Specialist interests were by no means ignored for consideration was given to 'Tax considerations',

'Legal aspects of company acquisitions' and a case study 'Establishing the purchase price in company acquisition'. As many speakers pointed out, in the final analysis what really counts is the quality of management, and this topic was explored in three papers - 'Managing a diversified holding company', 'Assessing management' and 'The role of the company marriage broker'. What better slogan could one find for the last named than that mentioned by Mr L. V. D. Tindale, c.a., of the Industrial and Commercial Finance Corporation - 'Matchmaker, matchmaker, make me a

Selective Employment Payments in Action

by H. S. A. MACNAIR, F.C.A.

CURRENT debating point in the context of Asocial security legislation concerns the extent to which the 'universal' character of certain central Government payments should yield place to a (more) selective character. Discrimination is, however, firmly attached to the disbursements to be made by the Ministry of Labour and other authorities under the terms of the Selective Employment Payments Act 1966 (here referred to as the 1966 Act) and Part IV of the Finance Act 1967 (here referred to as the 1967 Act) despite the fact that this legislation is partly integrated with existing social security arrangements.

A simple case is that of a private household which includes a person who is over the age of 70 and in which another person is employed in the rendering of domestic or nursing assistance for more than eight hours during any week-an expression which here means a period of seven days beginning with midnight between Sunday and Monday.

If the employer is a charity qualifying for a refund as such, or one who ranks for refund in some other capacity, then a refund is not due but otherwise it is obtainable from the Ministry of Social Security at the scale rates. It may be recalled that face values of the stamps currently payable for the principal classes of adult employees include selective employment tax of 25s out of the employer's 41s contribution for males, and 12s 6d in the case of female employees for whom the employer's contribution is 26s 1d.

More than one employee in household

A claim in respect of a private household for more than one employee presupposes the existence of special circumstances, the nature of which can be established to the satisfaction of the Supplementary Benefits Commission set up under section 3 and Schedule 1 of the Ministry of Social Security Act 1966. Disputes are referable to tribunals constituted in accordance with Schedule 3 and these bodies have a much more informal character than the Industrial Tribunals discussed below, although there is an echo of their constitutional arrangements in the requirement that one member of each three-man tribunal is to be appointed from among persons appearing to the Minister of Social Security to represent work-people.

However, one informality attracted criticism from the Council on Tribunals set up under the Tribunals and Inquiries Act 1958 to exercise supervision over the proliferation of statutory tribunals. Reference is made (1966 Annual Report, paragraphs 70 and 71) to the practice whereby tribunals mentioned above continue to meet in premises belonging to what is now the Ministry of Social Security, and the Council echoes the view of the Franks Committee that the independence of tribunals from official departments would be emphasized if arrangements were made for them to sit in premises separate from any Government office. The Council reports that the Supplementary Benefits Commission's forerunner (the National Assistance Board) had agreed to do all they could to meet this view although local town halls - perhaps the most obvious alternative - were often unsuitable, particularly as regards waiting facilities.

There are other circumstances besides the presence of an elderly person in a private household which rank as normal grounds for relief and it is sufficient to be in need of assistance by reason of infirmity, sickness, pregnancy or other incapacity. The presence of a child under the age of 16 (other than a child of the employee in question) is also a validating factor if the household has only a single bread-winner, working for a minimum of eight hours weekly, whether the parent of the child or standing in loco parentis.

The privileged position of manufacturing industry is now to be eroded by the elimination of premiums with effect from April 1st, 1968 (Hansard, November 28th, 1967), except in the development areas (see below). However, charities continue to be entitled to refunds (that is, equal to the tax paid) if they qualify under section 5 of the 1966 Act, and refunds are also obtainable in relation to employments in or carried out from an establishment engaged by way of business wholly or partly in primary activities or utilities, some of which are defined by reference to the 1963 Standard Industrial Classification, with particular mention of minimum list headings 001 (agriculture and horticulture), 002 (forestry), 003 (fishing), 602 (electricity) and 603 (water supply).

Agriculture and forestry

The first mentioned are given an extended meaning by section 10 (1) of the 1966 Act which refers to horticulture, fruit growing, seed growing, dairy farming and livestock breeding and keeping, the use of land as grazing land, meadow land, osier land, market gardens or nursery grounds or woodlands ancillary to farming, whether these are carried out by the owner or occupier of the land concerned or by some other person on a contract basis. In this connection 'livestock' includes any creature kept for the production of food, wool, skins or fur, or for the purposes of use in farming. Moreover, particulars of forestry are elaborated as the growing of seedlings and transplants for forestry purposes, the planting and replanting of forests and the preparation of ground therefor, the installation and repair of fences and drains required for forestry purposes, the protection of forests against fire or animal and insect pests, diseases, weeds and trespass. Allied to these (except when carried out by sawmilling establishments) are the thinning, felling and bringing to the roadside of timber, and the preparation of forest produce, as far as the roadside, together with the construction and upkeep of forest roads, the maintenance and management of forests and the gathering of their uncultivated produce.

Other primary activities are those of mining and quarrying (Order II) with open-cast mining. A final mention is that of transport and communications (Order XIX) exclusive of storage and services incidental to transport as described in minimum list heading 709 but inclusive of the operation of road transport ancillary to qualifying establishments (see section 2 (3) (c) of the 1966 Act).

Already some fifty or so cases have been taken before the Industrial Tribunal and in this connection approved rural activities include land drainage per fames Richmond Ltd v. Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food ([1967] I.T.R.¹ 94), fencing per Halkett v. Secretary of State for Scotland Department of Agriculture and Fisheries ([1967] I.T.R. 453) and Jackson v. ibid ([1967]) I.T.R. 520), also the preparation of produce for market per Sandwich & District Growers Ltd v. Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food ([1967] I.T.R. 450).

Food preparation

It seems opportune to consider here the position of those food preparation businesses where the processes are sufficiently sophisticated to deserve elevation to the ranks of manufacturing industry. Perhaps an extreme case was the decision that a tea-bag was a manufactured article distinct from tea, per Tetley Tea Co Ltd v. Minister of Labour ([1967] I.T.R. 541). Mention may also be made of the adapting of potatoes for use in the catering trade, per Minister of Labour v. Shieldness Produce Ltd ([1967] T.R. 173), and the conservation of barley destined for malting ([1967] I.T.R. 379).

However, it was held that the routine operations of the meat and fish trade failed to qualify, per Martin v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 87), G. Walsham & Sons Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 89), and Swift & Co Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 449), although quick freezing was accepted by the Tribunal as a substantive operation as regards meat, per Dobson v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 426), and fish processing, per William Freeland & Sons (Aberdeen) Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 457). Indeed, these decisions seem to have prompted a question in Parliament which led the Government spokesman to state that the selective employment payments classification is under review, although a statutory instrument will be required to modify it (Hansard, November 13th, 1967).

On the same occasion a Member of Parliament made particular reference to the photographic industry, perhaps spurred by several decisions adverse to those engaged in commercial photography, namely The Photoprint Co v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 170), Vu-ray Industrial Radiography Service v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 427), Ocean Pictures (Southampton) Ltd and Others v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 445) and Skyphotos Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 573), although favourable decisions have been given as regards the more specialized activities of X-ray testing, per Metallurgical Radiologists Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 551), and map-making, per Cook, Hammond & Kell Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 570). This may be the place to mention that the writing of technical manuals did not qualify, per Jones v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 554) although the manufacture of invoices did, per Colmer (The Listaform) Co v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 563).

Other demarcation decisions

by a manufacturer but involving only a minority of employees, as contrasted with contract services such as factory cleaning, per Roystan Factory Services Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 448), making drawings, per The Woodside Drawing Co v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 429) and even contract labour, per Manpower Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 589).

Similar remarks apply to preliminary activities independently operated as instanced by the sampling of bulk ore, per Daniel C. Griffith & Co Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 524), and the check measurement of timber, per A. & W. Fullarton Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 366) or coal, per Ellistown Colliery Checkweigh Committee v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 447). Similarly the sorting of waste failed to qualify in I. Goldman Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 514) and Sterling Products Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 539) as contrasted with the production of clean rags, as per E. Austin & Sons (London) Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 546).

On the other hand, the Industrial Tribunal seems to have felt no difficulty in accepting precision cutting of bespoke steel blanks as within the ambit of manufacture, per M.O.L. v. Gunner Iron & Steel Co (Wollescote) Ltd and M.O.L. v. Dyas & Fowle Ltd ([1967] T.R. 141), following Glen Metals Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 430), H. A. Bore Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 455) and Lye Trading Co Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 522). Indeed, precision cutting continued to qualify as manufacture when applied to plastic sheeting divided into tablecloths, per Rapico Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 578), while design activities qualified in M.O.L. v. Reliant Tool Co [(1967] T.R. 175), a decision recently endorsed in the first ruling by the House of Lords on selective employment tax (The Times, December 20th, 1967), and Lowton Structural Steel Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 374) even though carried out by a separate undertaking.

Delivery and final stages of manufacture

The demarcation of transport activities has also occupied the attention of the Tribunal. In particular it is necessary to distinguish between classification 703 which reads 'Road Haulage Contracting – Cartage and haulage contractors (whether using motor or horse-drawn vehicles) of all types, including furniture removers. Transport departments of establishments carrying goods in connection with their own businesses are excluded'; and classification 709 referred to above which is concerned with activities on the perimeter of transport.

Haulage repair depots qualified in Union Cartage Co Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 575) as did the physical delivery of manufactured vehicles, per Dealers Deliveries Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 565), even when the vehicles were not transported because of their size but merely driven, per Jardine v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 239), but rail loading and forwarding without physical delivery did not qualify, per M.A.T. Transport Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 586). A claim also failed as regards the associated warehousing and distributing company of a manufacturer, per Alexander ... McAslan & Co Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 431).

However, in a wider context, end-point decisions favourable to the taxpayer were reached in relation to the bottling of beer, per Robert Porter & Co Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 582), the pressing of suitings, per I. & A. Mednick v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 569), the independent erection of prefabricated tanks and chimneys per Turnill v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 456) and the planning and supervision of tin dredger assembly, per F. W. Payne & Son v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 560).

The processing of road chippings attracted the manufacturer's premium when this side of the business preponderated over the quarrying to which it related, per William Lind & Co Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 432), a result also reached in relation to the supply on site of ready-mixed concrete, per Alan S. Denniff Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 368).

However, the construction industry generally is comprised in Order XVII, a classification not attracting relief, as illustrated by Scaffolding (Great Britain) Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 555) and Charles Wark & Sons v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 311) although the making of scenery for theatrical productions qualified in Alick Johnstone Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 580).

Non-qualifying activities

One point to be borne in mind is that even an establishment which would otherwise qualify by reference to its activities will be excluded from refund if more than half of the persons engaged in those activities are employed wholly or mainly in non-qualifying activities, that is, in general, activities carried on for office purposes, including the purposes of administration, handling money, telephone and telegraph operating and clerical work, with specific mention of writing, book-keeping, sorting papers, filing, typing, duplicating, machine calculating. Selling and non-independent delivery operations are also non-qualifying.

The demarcation problems raised by these rules were reviewed by the High Court in M.O.L. v. Morgan ([1967] T.R. 147) and are further illustrated by Tribunal decisions in East African Standard (Newspapers) Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 233) relating to a London branch office, A. Schulman Inc. Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 236) relating to waste treatment, Charles H. Julian Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 367) relating to whisky blending, Peter McAinsh Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 373) where the office was separate from the qualifying sawmill, A. H. Stockwell Ltd v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 439) concerning a publisher's staff and Co-ordinated Traffic Services Ltd and Another v. M.O.L. ([1967] I.T.R. 435) involving road transport with contract labour.

Evidently it is important that steps should be available to contest the allocation of a classification which the taxpayer considers inappropriate. Section 7 of the 1966 Act provides that the Minister of Labour or, in the case of agriculture and forestry, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (for Scottish establishments, the Secretary of State) is to compile and maintain a register of establishments which satisfy him as qualifying.

Paragraph 29 of the Ministry of Labour Guide for Employers states that as regards applications from 1967 onwards, the Minister may withhold payments to employers in respect of any period before the registration of their establishments. In this connection a Government answer to a question in Parliament stated that there is no specified period during which a farmer must register and that the Divisional offices have discretion to back-date a registration for twentyeight days, although it was on record that some two hundred applications for longer periods involving £,10,000 odd had been refused (Hansard, November 29th, 1967). It is important to note that there is no right of appeal against a refusal by the Minister to exercise his discretionary power to divide or aggregate establishments.

Industrial tribunals

However, the right to registration may be conferred by a determination of a tribunal established under section 12 of the Industrial Training Act 1964 to which the question has been referred. These tribunals were originated to provide machinery for appealing against assessments to Industrial Training Levy but their character was amplified to accommodate appeals under the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, of which section 46 provides that the Minister shall by regulations make such provision as appears to him to be necessary or expedient with respect to proceedings to determine any question which, by or under any statutory provision passed or made after the passing of that Act, is directed to be referred to and determined by a tribunal established under section 12 of the Industrial Training Act 1964.

Hence it is under those powers that the Industrial Tribunals (Selective Employment Payments) Regulations 1966 were made and it is interesting to note that their issue was preceded by consultation on the part of the Ministry of Labour with the Council on Tribunals. These regulations were extended in 1967 to reflect the provisions of the 1967 Act and in each case there is a separate statutory instrument for Scotland (S.I. 1966/1231 and S.I. 1967/1299). It will be recalled that the Selective Employment Payments legislation does not apply to Northern Ireland.

The fact that it is the tribunals originally set up under the auspices of the Industrial Training Act 1964 that are now required to determine selective employment payment matters renders the tracing of their credentials somewhat complicated. The latter Act provided authority for the Industrial Tribunals (England and Wales) Regulations 1965 whereby the key office of President of the Industrial Tribunals (England and Wales) was established, to be filled from the ranks of barristers or solicitors of not less than seven years standing on an appointment by the Lord Chancellor.

Regulation 4 of statutory instrument 1101 of 1965 goes on to provide that the number of tribunals is to be such as the President may from time to time determine and he is to determine also the times and places at which they are to sit.

The tribunals are to consist of a chairman (qualified in the same way as the President) and two other members although, by consent of the parties, a tribunal may be properly constituted if only one such member is present, in which event the chairman has a second, casting vote. It is noteworthy that each pair of members, who in theory are to be selected by the President on the occasion of each hearing, is to be drawn from either side of industry, that is, from panels of persons appointed by the Minister of Labour after consultation with any organizations representative on the one hand of employers and on the other of employed persons.

An interesting point is that, despite the private character of a hearing, any member of the Council on Tribunals is entitled to be present although it appears from their annual report that the Council did not exercise this right in 1966. However, the Council was consulted about the regulations referred to above and they questioned the procedural provisions relating to privacy of hearings, the furnishing by an applicant of further particulars of the grounds of his claim and ex parte orders by a tribunal requiring persons to attend as witnesses or to produce documents, including discovery of documents. At the Council's suggestion privacy was made the normal arrangement unless the applicant requested or the tribunal decided that the hearing should be held in public.

The right to require further particulars was given to the Minister only on the grounds that the facts of any given case would be peculiarly within the applicant's knowledge so that reciprocal entitlement was not required, a point which the Council decided not to pursue further. The ex parte proposal was dropped and instead such orders are to be made on notice to the person concerned, with a right of objection before any order is made. Points of distinction as compared with income tax and corporation tax appeals before the General or Special Commissioners include the right of the Industrial Tribunal to receive written representations, to arrive at decisions in the absence of the parties and to award costs.

Originating applications

The regulations set out seven types of form although there is little distinction between Form 1 ('premium' application), Form 2 ('refund') and Form 3 ('agriculture and forestry'). The criteria of charitable status cannot be dealt with by the Tribunal but both charities and qualifying establishments may originate an application on Form 4 to determine the quantum of their entitlement. Form 5 relates to the date from which entitlement commences. The determination of a question relating to a part-time worker is originated on Form 5A and Form 5B relates to a person employed outside the United Kingdom.

Notices of hearing by the Tribunal are to be issued on Form 6. The prescribed addresses for service of notice to the 'appropriate Minister' by an applicant in England and Wales are 8 St James's Square, SW1 (Minister of Labour), Whitehall, SW1 (Agriculture, Fisheries and Food) and Wardpark, Cumbernauld, Glasgow (Minister of Social Security, Selective Employment Tax Repayments Office).

Refunds for part-time workers

The 1967 Act introduced arrangements for 'part-time' refunds at half the scale rate where an adult employee did no work or worked for an aggregate period of less than twenty-one hours in the week (this may be termed a 'mini-period') except where the contract in pursuance of which he worked or the holding of any office constituting the employment involved his working for more than a 'mini-period'. If remuneration is calculated by reference to an hourly rate then only the hours reckoned for payment purposes are relevant but in other cases intervals allowed for meals and rest are to be included. Moreover, employment by different employers who are associated companies is in general to be amalgamated.

Overseas employments

Full-rate refund is available where a person has been continuously employed by the United Kingdom employer wholly outside both the United Kingdom and any area for the time being designated under section 1 (7) of the Continental Shelf Act 1964. However, it must be emphasized that refunds are only obtainable for periods following the first thirteen weeks of overseas service – a rule said to be necessary to avoid a sense of grievance on the part of those who might just fail to qualify leading to agitation for 'marginal' relief (Hansard, June 8th, 1967).

It may be relevant to record here that the cost of collecting selective employment tax has recently been estimated at about £850,000, while the cost of administering the claims for refunds and premiums in a full year was estimated at about £1·1 million (Hansard, November 15th, 1967).

On the other hand the 'overseas' character of a period is not vitiated by certain short visits to the United Kingdom or Continental Shelf area, nor is continuity broken by an 'idle' week for which selective employment tax was not paid by reason of the employed person being on unpaid leave or unable to work, whatever his geographical location. 'Unable to work' implies the agency of some specific disease or bodily or mental disablement, and the duration of the short-term visit may not be such as to include more than twenty-one 'disqualifying' days.

Days in an 'idle' week are not 'disqualifying' days nor are isolated days of an 'idle' character except that a Saturday or Sunday or other day which is not normally a work-day may only be counted as part of a period of leave if included in a period of seven consecutive days of leave. Even one 'disqualifying' day precludes refund to an employer for the week in which it is included unless it was a day on which the employee did no work. It may be noted that continuity can be preserved as between different employers if they are associated companies.

In this connection any question arising under section 25 (2) of the 1967 Act as to whether and by whom a person was employed for any week outside both the United Kingdom and the Continental Shelf, or whether tax was not payable for any week by reason of incapacity or unpaid leave, is one which has to be determined not by the above-mentioned tribunals but under the National Insurance Acts. In the United Kingdom section 64 of the National Insurance Act 1965 designates the Minister (of Social Security) as the authority invested with the powers of decision, subject to the right of either party to appeal to the High Court or (in Scotland) the Court of Session.

Regional employment premiums

The proposed withdrawal of the manufacturing premium from April 1st, 1968, emphasizes the continuing value of the regional employment premium introduced by section 26 of the 1967 Act at the rates of 30s (male) and 15s (female) for adults, the corresponding rates for juniors being 15s and 9s 6d. The scale of premium is halved where the employees work for 'mini-periods'.

The regions in question are represented by the development areas and localities specified by section 15 (2) and (6) of the Industrial Development Act 1966, mainly comprising Scotland (except a pocket around Edinburgh), Merseyside and Wales (except the Northeast and South-east coastal belts), England North of a line from Scarborough to Morecambe Bay along the southern edge of the North Riding of Yorkshire, but excluding York, Cornwall (except a pocket beside Plymouth) and the Atlantic half of Devon.

These boundaries and the scale of rates set out above may be modified by statutory instrument. The question may be asked what continued lease of life the development areas can expect for their premiums and it may be reassuring to observe that this point was examined in the Department of Economic Affairs publication in April 1967 which ushered in the regional proposals. In paragraph 40 it is said that it is not unrealistic to expect that the operation of the premium for, say, five years, together with the continuation of existing regional measures, should improve the structure of industry and raise the level of economic activity in the development areas to an extent which would make them much more capable of adjustment to change. 7 3 .50

A PARIS CONGRESS PAPER

Financial and Accounting Problems Peculiar to International Business

by S. R. HARDING, F.C.A. Financial Director, Thomas Tilling Ltd

N so far as it is possible in a paper of this type I propose to deal with the subject by posing the problems and attempting to provide the answers, based upon my own experience. I must emphasize that these are essentially my personal views; they are not necessarily representative of the views of the profession in the United Kingdom, or of any company with which I have been connected.

The principal problems are to be found in the following

- Relationships between the central office and the subsidiaries, associated companies or branches overseas;
- (2) The planning process: how to make the operators accountable for their performance;
- (3) Capital investment;
- (4) Control of working capital and operating costs;
- (5) Financing and capitalization;
- (6) Local equity participation;
- (7) Taxation;
- (8) Investments and diversification;
- (9) Special problems posed by 'problem' countries;
- (10) Internal audit and control;
- (11) Data processing and computer systems;
- (12) The finance organization;
- (13) Personnel and training;
- (14) Consolidation of accounts.

The majority of the points in this list present problems in any business: but my purpose is to open the way for discussion on the particular aspects which affect international •business, that is to say, international trading organizations.

Most Governments urge their businessmen to do more business overseas, if it will improve the country's balance of payments, but not all Governments appreciate the number of problems and the size of the risks involved. On this point, at least, I think everyone will agree.

Relationships between central office and subsidiaries, associated companies or branches overseas

The aim here is to achieve the right balance between control by the central office, subject to legal and fiscal restraints, and the autonomy of the operations overseas. Too tight a control from the centre can lead to a big build up of staff at the centre and a tremendous flow of unnecessary paper. On the other hand a loose control, possibly designed to encourage the initiative and autonomy of the operator, may lead to loss of the benefits which should be inherent in the membership of an international group. There can be wasted effort whilst individual members of the group of companies endeavour to solve problems which have already been solved elsewhere – in short a failure to make use of the pool of knowledge which an international group should be able to accumulate at the centre and feed out in the form of instructions or advice.

There are certain essentials which can only be worked out by agreement between the central office and the operators:

- (i) forward objectives and plans of the operating units overseas;
- (ii) level of capital expenditure and investment of funds in working capital;
- (iii) approval of individual capital expenditure projects, and of loans to customers and rental agreements involving large sums, above certain prescribed limits;
- (iv) procurement of supplies, particularly if these are not indigenous;
- (v) methods of financing the operation;
- (vi) problems of corporate structure, shareholdings, etc.;
- (vii) appointment of key members of the management team.

In these matters the central office, representing the share-holders, must have the final decision to suit the overall objectives of the group, although such decisions will be based largely upon the advice of the operators who know their business and the market in which they are operating. In all other matters I consider that operators should be given freedom to operate – always, of course, in the interests of the group as a whole – being held accountable for the achievement of targets which they will have agreed as realistic with the central office.

A common error, notably in groups which have not yet learned by experience, is to attempt to impose upon overseas operations the identical controls which have proved themselves domestically. In the same way that successful overseas business needs to be performed in the language of the country, with participation in management by people of the country, so it is necessary to mould the control of operations to the surroundings, without lowering standards to an unacceptable level.

It seldom pays to impose domestic standards on overseas operations, any more than it pays to impose the usually high standards of a large group upon every small company which may join the family. It is all too easy to turn a small but profitable operation, with low overheads, into an unprofitable organization, if one imposes unnecessarily high standards; in other words to turn 'profit into overheads'. I shall touch on this in more detail when we come to discuss controls and accountability.

There has been a marked difference in the past between the North American and British approaches to this problem, but this is tending to disappear. American business methods have been more formalized, in the sense of manualization, whilst the British have tended to improvise. With the development of computers it is essential to standardize on systems if worth-while results are to be obtained, and there is an increasing tendency for British business to do this.

At the same time the North Americans, with growing experience of overseas operations, are realizing that complete standardization of world-wide operations is not always practical, particularly where there may be substantial local shareholding with local management being entrusted more and more to the people of the country.

Probably the most important angle of relationships is that of communications, including visits from the centre to the operating units. It is essential that the central office staff visit overseas operations in order to appreciate the problems on the spot and see the staff in action, but a properly established control system, based on accountability against targets, should eliminate the need for visits of the type which do nothing but distract the attention of operators from the job in hand, which encourage opinions based on brief experience, and which lead to temporary solutions to problems which call for well considered study. Visits are expensive, both in time and money, and should as a general rule be made for a specific object and designed principally to serve the needs of the operating units.

The planning process: How to make operators accountable for their performance

The approach to this is bound to vary between organizations, and there is sufficient material in this one topic to fill a book. In fact far too much is being written about it these days, yet too little action being taken. The task of designing, installing and overseeing a control system in an international organization is, for obvious reasons, much more difficult than in a domestic operation, and one cannot do more in a paper such as this than to state a few personal views.

'Person-to-person' discussion of plans, forecasts and targets is essential; it is most difficult to raise any real enthusiasm for this subject by written communication. All who are responsible for the implementation of plans and targets should be brought into the picture at the earliest possible stage, as to the general objectives of the group, which should be agreed at the beginning of one year in respect of the next and subsequent years. The operators should also be closely concerned with the creation and updating of forecasts, which are the basis for their targets covering demand, supply, investment, income and expense, cash flow, rates of return, etc.

Targets should be difficult to hit, but they have to be hit if the basic circumstances within the control of the operators remain unchanged. Accountability can only be established and enforced against agreed targets, and it is essential that the comparison of actuals with targets should not be allowed to deteriorate into a tiresome obligation to explain away variations! Finance has a big part to play in all this, both in the central office and in the operating companies.

As regards international business, I am against the central office becoming over-involved in the control process, once this has been properly set up and competent local management appointed. To do so only adds to the size of the central office, and to the paper work at both ends. Management by exception, against targets, must be the key. Whilst aiming at a standardized system of controls one cannot be too rigid. Furthermore, overseas operating units are usually separate corporate entities, whereas domestic units are more frequently divisions/branches etc., so that the figures used as a bridge of information between the operators and the central office must be those which the former recognize and use in their operations.

Consolidated accounts obviously have to be in the currency of the group, whilst the end-result of the group's operations, in whatever currency, have to reflect the movement of exchange rates; but it is no use asking a manager doing business in Indonesian rupiahs or Brazilian cruzeiros to regard himself as accountable exclusively, for instance, in sterling or dollars.

In countries with above-average rates of inflation, there will inevitably be dual accounting and evaluation of performance; first, in terms of local currency, usually showing an impressive but inflated picture, and often giving grounds for false optimism without regard for the loss in value of the money earned; and secondly, in hard currency, when the picture is seldom stimulating and often negative.

Inflation makes forecasting even more difficult than usual and, of course, puts a great strain on working capital resources, the price structure, and managerial time. Orthodox economists say that there is no such thing as controlled inflation; to them a small inflation is like a small pregnancy – some day the affected fruit will fall!

It is essential that control systems are reviewed fairly regularly to confirm that all the work involved is of value, and that the information being received still meets requirements. Once a system has been set up and is running smoothly, people tend to shy away from making changes. In this connection, the amount and frequency of reporting from the larger operating units does not necessarily have to be extended to all the smaller units; it is not uncommon in a group of one hundred companies for ten to contribute 90 per cent of the proceeds, profit, etc., and these are usually the units which need the closest watching from the viewpoint of the impact of their performances upon the group as a whole. However, the affairs of the smaller companies, often with less experienced management, tend to occupy a good deal of time at the centre.

Accountability in an international organization is a difficult but vital matter; with varying, and quickly changing, conditions it is not easy to decide at the end of the year which manager deserves a bonus, or the reverse!

Particularly difficult is the frequent lack of a realistic profitability yardstick by which the performance of an overseas operation can be judged, due to the well-known problem of the transfer prices of raw material, intermediates, etc. This may mean that the important stimulus of an improvement in the return on capital employed, and the use of this in the comparison of performance between one company and another, is missing. One of the biggest problems which exercises international business is how to replace this yardstick by others which are meaningful, both to the local company and to the group as a whole.

Capital investment

After the establishment of group objectives, of which the operating companies must be kept clearly informed, and the subsequent establishment of targets by the latter, the investment programme should be drawn up; thereafter all projects should be identifiable with the objectives. The investment programme covers not only capital expenditure but also long-term commitments and receivables, and working capital increases. What may be an attractive prospect, using discounted cash flow principles, in one country may be completely unacceptable in another, due to exchange problems, the political situation, etc.; it is, of course, the cash flow which can be used freely by the group in any other part of the world which matters, and in countries where the future is particularly uncertain 'pay-out' time is far more important than 'earning power'.

The artificial restraints of budgeting for capital expenditure by years tends to be incompatible with operating efficiency, leading as it does to a tendency for 'stop-go'; the effect of this in a large international group can be very marked. It is necessary to look at least five years ahead, and the timing of expenditure is as important as the specific amount of the budget itself. A common fault is for operating companies to over-estimate their ability to implement capital expenditure, and the cumulative effect of this on a group's cash flow picture can be startling, and costly in that money has to be kept readily available but is not in fact used as forecast. It needs to be impressed upon operators that to overrate the speed of expenditure can be as harmful to a group's cash forecast as to underestimate it. Nobody will be blamed for spending authorized money faster than forecast, if faster spending will increase profitability.

International business has in recent years suffered from expropriation in a number of countries, without adequate compensation; this factor and the effect of exchange controls, devaluation, etc., are risks which emphasize the difference between international and domestic business. The World Bank is working on a plan for the settlement of expropriation disputes, and some agreement on the status and treatment of foreign capital is certainly badly needed.

Control of working capital and operating costs

Although the problems here are not peculiar to international business, geography does make it more difficult to exercise control over activities in countries widely dispersed, with varying rates of inflation and with differing conditions and currencies. It is difficult to set up standards for comparison of performance between one country and another, except possibly for certain items such as staff and labour numbers, stock and credit indices, etc. In setting the targets for the following year the most realistic approach is to aim at an improvement in performance against that of preceding years, and against that of competitors in the same country.

There are, however, certain essentials, e.g., insistence upon a proper coding system for cost analysis, which will provide a framework for efficient forecasting, a true reflection of responsibilities and the rapid appraisal of marginal costs for new or changing business. The latter is a most important point. I doubt if more than a minority of international concerns have a clear idea of the cost of marginal business, particularly where the raw material is produced in one country and the end product is sold in another country. The treatment of indirect and fixed expense still tends to cloud the real issue which is, of course, the effect on cash of the new or changing business.

In my view the minimum of detail should be rendered to the central office, unless there are material variations from target, in which case written explanations are seldom as satisfactory as on-the-spot visits. The job of the finance department at the centre is to improve the analytical procedures for use in the operating companies, speeding up the figures and insisting upon the cancellation of unnecessary information. Tradition dies hard, so that if a firm line is not taken from the centre there can be a waste of effort in, for example, the allocation of general charges and overheads on completely arbitrary bases.

My experience of clerical standards in the majority of countries overseas is that there is often tremendous diligence and loyalty, but seldom sufficient questioning of the need for figures; people tend to assume that everything they do is at the request of somebody in the central office, which it would be presumptuous to question. They should be kept informed about the end use of their labours and encouraged to ask questions and show initiative. So often in a large group there is work going on at the lower levels which is no longer required.

Financing and capitalization

Views on this will vary according to the particular circumstances of the group, and to conditions in the country where the finance is required. The most flexible method of financing is credit on supplies etc., from overseas, which may carry an interest charge depending upon the circumstances in the country concerned. Loan capital ensures repatriation of capital, as do redeemable shares; both allow for the repatriation of money surplus to local requirements. This is important since conditions may arise, perhaps through some restriction on the ability to expand, when cash may accumulate in excess of what can be disposed of by dividend distribution.

Equity capital is usually locked into a country. There does not appear to have been overmuch insistence by overseas Governments upon the amount of finance which should be represented by equity capital; the decision seems to have depended more upon what is reasonable in relation to the profits earned, so that the percentage return on capital, using the term capital in its narrowest sense, is not excessive. In Britain and in the U.S.A. a high ratio of equity to loan is fairly normal, but in some other countries, where the cult of equity investment is less developed, as much as three-quarters of the finance may be supplied by long term loans.

Local borrowing is a most important feature in the financing of overseas business operations. It is essential as a hedge if there is the risk of devaluation, and important if the after tax cost of borrowing compares favourably with the net interests which can be earned on the investment of a group's central funds, or if there is a restriction upon the investment of the latter overseas. Better rates of interest can usually be obtained on local borrowing if the parent company is prepared to put up guarantees, but the cumulative effect of such guarantees upon a group's balance sheet needs to be carefully weighed up.

Local equity participation

My remarks here refer to public shareholding, as distinct from shareholding by selected persons closely concerned with the local business. The pressure to introduce local equity invariably comes from local management or from THE the Governments of the countries concerned, and it is becoming increasingly necessary to allow local equity if one is to do successful business overseas and compete with companies whose shareholders are exclusively of the country. The timing is a fine point of judgement; ideally become impossible to resist, and no earlier.

Local equity participation, in my experience, invariably adds to the complications of overseas business, whilst the advantages do not always turn out to be as concrete as expected, either by the local shareholders or by those on the spot who are subjected to the pressures to take this step.

one should move just ahead of the point when local pressures

There are problems in running a local operation in the interests of both the international group and the local shareholders; there may be differing views when it comes to matters such as the raising of additional capital, dividend declarations, the use of surplus funds, trading arrangements when the interests of other group companies are involved, fees for royalties and services rendered, etc. There is always the problem not only of being fair, but of being seen to be fair, to the minority shareholders. These points, and others, may have led to the absorption in recent years by some international groups of the local equity, e.g., by Fords in the United Kingdom, and by Philips Petroleum in Australia.

A particularly important point, in the case of existing ventures, is that one can rarely obtain a price for the shares offered to the public which represents their true value in terms of earning power. Furthermore, even if a reasonable price is obtained, it is often difficult to remit the proceeds; one is then left with blocked funds subject to the risk of devaluation and possibly earning an unsatisfactory rate of

It is therefore better, in my opinion, as a general rule to encourage the investors of countries where one is operating to acquire shares in the parent company of a group (if this can be arranged subject to local exchange control) than to encourage their participation in a local company which may not continuously yield attractive profits.

Taxation

At the time of writing this paper (July 1965) which, to allow for translation, circulation, etc., unfortunately has to be far in advance of the date of the Congress, the taxation burden on overseas investment is a very vexed question in the United Kingdom. Shareholders in certain companies with overseas interests will suffer severely from the Finance Act of 1965 through the inability to offset, to the same extent as previously, the high tax rates paid in many overseas countries. This coupled with the high rates of tax on dividends, leaves such companies badly off as compared with their counterparts in other countries with whom they compete in the world markets.

Most Governments give substantial tax relief to high risk ventures such as mining and other extractive industries; for example, in the U.S.A. which recognizes the importance of a stake in overseas raw materials resources, tax arrangements permit the domestic depletion allowances to be applied to overseas operations. No such relief is available to British companies. One can understand the need from time to time for temporary restraint upon the export of capital for overseas investment, but the penalizing through taxation of existing profitable investment cannot be in the long-term interests of a country.

In overseas operations, constant top-level management scrutiny is required of the transfer price mechanism. This is full of potential difficulties concerning particularly the taxation and central bank authorities of the transferor and the transferee countries. It is unnecessary to enlarge on this problem, except to say that if an inquiry into transfer prices is launched it can safely be faced up to only by the most meticulous and extensive assembly of all relevant data, evidence and argument. It is well to assume from the outset that the effort will be intense and prolonged.

A similar point arises where, in countries of the same geographical area, it is desired to economize by providing a common service e.g., on computers, internal audit, etc. The taxation aspects of such arrangements need careful study since savings can soon be dissipated if a company receiving service is unable to accept a charge for taxation purposes, whilst the company giving the service may have part of the costs disallowed.

In an international group the tax expert can be more valuable and indispensable than any other one man. Decisions taken at the centre, on his advice, can involve very large sums of money; and in the operating companies, whilst local tax regulations may appear to be overriding, it is surprising what benefit can be obtained through the central office expert's knowledge of precedents elsewhere in the world.

Investments and diversification

These, especially diversification, are matters which can seldom be left to the discretion of individual operating companies. The extent to which a group wishes to extend its lines of activity in this way is a matter for decision at the highest level. The problem becomes particularly difficult in an international group when local management in some faraway country, encouraged possibly by the representatives of the local equity shareholders, puts forward a proposal which to them may look attractive and completely sound. From the centre such a proposal may appear to involve an undesirable precedent as regards other countries (a most important point in any decision in an international group), and a dilution of management's time and effort should there be doubt about the quality of the management to be taken

Such problems can be fairly quickly ironed out in a domestic organization, but it is a lot more difficult internationally. It is most important, therefore, that operating companies should be kept well in touch with the group's policy views on this subject, with reference also to the availability of funds for this purpose, so that they do not waste time and enthusiasm on projects which are never likely to get off the ground. Finance, obviously, has a very important part to play in the examination of such proposals, both in the operating company and in the central office.

Special problems posed by 'problem' countries

One of the big risks incurred by international business is the sudden deterioriation, politically or economically, of a country where investments are held. Failure to identify and anticipate the first signs of such deterioration usually means that when the crisis arises it is too late to take avoiding action. This is one of the most important responsibilities of the men on the spot; nevertheless local appraisals need to be supplemented by a view from outside, since proximity to the scene sometimes makes it difficult to be objective. At both ends the responsibility for appraisal and action needs to be clearly defined, and the tools available

MONEY BAGIN

The sooner you can get work on to a newly-installed computer (or the quicker you can add a new requirement to the load of an existing machine) the sooner you start to get back the money you've invested. I.C.T. has a special User Programming Service that helps users make their computers as profitable as possible, as quickly as possible. The Service is particularly valuable whenever there are peak loads to cope with (i.e. before and during installation)—and it helps users to overcome staff difficulties.

U.P.S. helps your profitability

The U.P.S. is a full scale Department of I.C.T. with a staff of nearly 200. At the start of negotiations with a user the job to be done is clearly identified, and a firm price and delivery date for thoroughly documented and de-bugged programs is quoted.

I.C.T.'s systems and programming standards are observed to ensure present and future compatibility.

Programs are written in COBOL, EMA, FORTRAN, ALGOL or PLAN and can range from individual runs to complete systems. Work handled for users has varied in size from 5 to 500 man weeks and has included building site work-in-progress evaluations, sales accounting, marketing models, hire purchase, statistical analysis, production scheduling, real-time data collection, stock control, rental accounting and payrolls.

U.P.S. is for I.C.T. computer users exclusively. For a brochure giving full details, please return the coupon.

for the required analysis should be kept permanently sharp.

By avoiding action, I have in mind the purchase of forward exchange cover and other exchange arrangements, the maximizing of local borrowing and reduction of working capital, the remittance of profits and reduction of debts due outside the country by prompt payment of invoices etc. If these steps are left too late, inflation, exchange controls, devaluation, and emergency taxation will take their toll. One is then left with a salvaging operation, the urgent pruning of staff, operating and capital expenditure, with activity confined within the limits of local cash generation.

The effects of devaluation are undoubtedly one of the big risks of international business; it is all too easy to show a substantial 'profit' in the books in terms of local currency, yet a red figure in terms of sterling due to exchange losses on working capital.

Internal audit and control

The smallest business should have efficient built-in controls, and any business of size needs an internal audit (in the broadest sense) which is an effective tool of management. The special problem which concerns international business is to decide whether the internal audit should be left exclusively in the hands of operating companies, or whether some form of audit from the centre should be superimposed on, or even replace, the local audit. Much depends upon the quality of the latter and upon the value, matched against the cost, of an audit working out from the centre.

My feeling is that for a variety of reasons one does not always get full value for money from a local internal audit, particularly in the less developed countries, and that a small but high-powered team of management auditors from the centre can therefore justify the cost. This is another way in which the world-wide experience of an international group can be broadcast through visits to the operating companies.

The problem is to get the right men, with a knowledge of languages, who are prepared to travel fairly permanently. If such men can be obtained their work should prove most valuable in their career development as future managers. On the other hand, to use second-rate men, or to concentrate in such visits on 'ticking', is a sheer waste of money, a hindrance to the operators, and bad for the reputation of the central office.

Data processing and computer systems

Here is an outstanding example of an operation which needs to be closely co-ordinated from the centre; failure to do this will result in individual companies wasting an enormous amount of time in the development stage, duplication of effort between companies and probably the wrong choice of machine. Failure to standardize on machines will usually mean that programs will not be interchangeable, computer language will vary, and the benefits of size and experience will be lost.

It is difficult for an overseas management to appreciate to the full the new opportunities which are being constantly opened up by computers for integrated analysis and information (of which accounting is only one aspect), the solution of problems with many variables etc.

In North America, in the larger European countries and in countries such as Japan and Australia, computers are now a part of everyday business life, but it is impossible for a man in parts of Africa or the East to keep in touch with computer developments and possibilities, and to relate these to his own requirements. To such people computers still tend to be a source of terror rather than of inspiration, and it is the responsibility of the central office of an international group to keep their top men overseas in touch with such matters.

Most books on the subject still tend to be too technical for management and my experience is that some direct contact with computers, when one can actually get one's hands on the machines etc., is invaluable in dispelling the mystique. There should be great scope for the use of computers on data processing in the less developed areas, through the elimination of errors which tend to multiply when figures are transcribed by hand.

As regards the computer staff problem there are three points which particularly affect international business. First, the central office must have sufficient men of quality who are prepared to travel, equipped to advise the operating companies and ensure proper co-ordination. Secondly, after a computer has been successfully installed in one country the local staff responsible will tend to seek employment elsewhere; they will be in great demand. Every effort should be made to encourage such staff to put their experience to use for the group in other countries, rather than to leave them in their own country with what may be limited opportunities for promotion.

Thirdly, it is often a mistake to put into the computer field men who have spent twenty years on punched-card machines; computers are a young man's field and it is usually more profitable to engage a nucleus of young and technically well-qualified men when installing a computer, rather than to rely entirely upon older men, whose age, experience and training may give them little chance of matching up to the problems of computer application.

The finance organization

Should one have the best men at the centre, or in the operating companies? This must depend a great deal on the structure of the group, and on the special talents of the men, some of whom will be more valuable in the front line of an operating company than in the more remote planning atmosphere of a central office. But it is remarkable how quickly the best men, left too long in one country, can become insular in outlook or even stagnate. Some countries produce this effect on people more quickly than do others, and not always by reason of the geographical climate. In general I consider that the best men should be at the centre providing, ideally, that they have had practical experience overseas and can keep this experience up to date.

The financial organization of a group at the centre will, of course, vary considerably. It is obviously essential to have a group controller, a group treasurer and a group tax manager although – depending upon the size and complications of the group – the latter may report to one of the other two. On top of these it is usual to have a financial director.

If the group has large and widespread interests, there may also be a case for separate finance advisers for geographical regions, working in parallel with the controller, treasurer and tax manager. Their job would be to look after the interests of companies within their regions and to be responsible for the co-ordination of, and advice on, all aspects of finance within their regions; they would turn, as necessary, to the controller, treasurer or tax manager for specialist advice.

Finance, being a large employer of people, has the constant responsibility for reducing the amount of nonessential work and the number of the people engaged upon this work. In some countries it is still a sign of status for a clerk to have a stack of paper in his tray, and the pay scales of supervisors may depend upon the number of men working for them rather than upon the importance and difficulty of the decisions they have to take. Such situations call for new ideas from outside and are best dealt with by transferring expatriate staff from elsewhere, who have the drive, determination and patience to get rid of the paper and make the necessary savings.

There is also the problem of how to set up the most efficient organization in countries where a number of separate operating companies exist. These companies may be a reflection of legal and fiscal necessity or of outside shareholding interests, the requirements of which must be observed, but the aim should be to organize the financial and accounting work so that it approaches as closely as possible the efficiency of a single company. There are great advantages and economies to be made, in such an area, through having a single finance organization which provides financial service to all who need it. There is a lot to be said, however, for locating a single finance representative of high quality with each individual company, but he should be retained on the finance establishment so that he does not lose his identity as, first and foremost, a representative of finance

It is becoming no easier to get good men to work overseas and the cost of engaging them is increasing. With greater pressures for the top jobs to be filled by local staff, young men think twice before committing themselves to an overseas career when jobs at home may be easier to obtain than in the past. The pioneer spirit may still be there but conditions have changed. As a result, the incentives required to attract good men and their families to work and live overseas have become increasingly expensive, with cost of living (including high local taxation) and hardship allowances, travel, education, etc.

The cost of an expatriate working overseas can be as much as four times what one would pay such a man in his own country. I know of countries where the employment of six expatriate staff at middle management level can dissipate £100,000 of profits before tax. Nevertheless a few expatriates will always be required in international business, particularly finance men and technologists. Indeed, I foresee that the post of chief executive in a local company will as a rule be occupied by a local man before that of the top finance man.

People working abroad have to realize that it is their job to become part of the country as quickly as possible, and that international businessmen must be truly international, speaking many languages. The life of a businessman based overseas may not be as easy as it was, but it develops initiative and broadens the right type of man. There should be a valuable feed-back of personnel from overseas to the centre in due course.

In a truly international group it is important to find the best men, regardless of nationality, and to use them to the fullest extent internationally and outside their own countries. To match up to this they need to spend a few years in the centre before moving around the world.

One of the most rewarding features on the personnel side of international business is the development of the people of the country to do the jobs which have formerly been the preserve of the foreigner, and in achieving this the encouragement of the universities and professions overseas is important. A proviso here, of course, is that the development of local staff to fill the top jobs is timed to suit the objectives and interests of the shareholders, and not enforced by local authorities with ultra-nationalistic intentions

As regards the training of men with management potential, the barriers between the various functions of a business have to be broken down. I can see little merit in a purely financial course attended exclusively by men working on finance, but I can see a lot of value in such a course for men who are not engaged in finance.

A special problem for international companies is the man who has worked well for some twenty years overseas but who, usually for domestic reasons, wishes to return for good to his own country. It is difficult to accommodate all such cases, when one may already be concerned about the size of the central office, and the scope for such moves is, unfortunately, likely to be limited except in the planned course of career development.

Consolidation of accounts

The legal requirements regarding accounting vary greatly as between one country and another, and there is a tendency for the divergence of accounting treatment to get worse rather than to improve. There are nevertheless, indications of greater disclosure for shareholders and for the investing public, not only in the amount of information but also in the frequency of disclosure, and also greater speed in the production of the accounts.

Few will deny the need for more detailed and more frequent information, but I should like to see greater attention paid to speed. This is something which our profession should actively encourage. Our record in this connection has not been good; we have been inclined to follow behind the initiative of others – notably some of the leading stock exchanges.

I have two observations about the '51 per cent or more' rule, normally observed in the consolidation of accounts. As already referred to above under 'Local equity participation', there is an increasing trend in large groups towards outside minority interests, and in world-wide operations on a large scale in such capital intensive operations as, for example, oil and mining, there are also an increasing number of ventures in which one may hold 50 per cent of the equity in partnership with other large organizations in the same line of business.

Under the normal procedures of consolidation the income from such a company is only reflected in a group's accounts to the extent of the dividends received, whilst the investment is maintained in the balance sheet at cost less any provisions. By reason, for instance, of the need to plough profits back, there may therefore be large profits not reflected in the group's income figure. In order to show a truer picture of consolidated earnings, some international groups have adopted the practice in such cases of writing up the investments by the annual amount of the retained earnings, thus benefiting net income by their share in earnings, whether declared as dividend or not. In the case of losses, of course, group net income suffers correspondingly and investments have to be written down.

The same procedure may be applied to companies in which there is an interest of more than 50 per cent, but

• which may involve comparatively insignificant amounts and whose operations are not a part of, or have only a fringe relationship with, the group's main business, e.g. small trade investment or diversification projects. To involve such small companies – often staffed in an international organization by people who find English difficult to understand – in the work of producing accounting returns up to the standard required by an international group can be a waste of time and money.

As regards the divergence of accounting treatment, presentation and disclosure, it is my view that more could be done by the leaders of our profession from various countries sitting down together in order to examine the divergencies and the reasons for them. There are, for example, many points of difference as between U.S.A. and United Kingdom treatment, the former tending to be followed in Canada and the latter by other countries which have, or have had, associations with the United Kingdom. To attempt to iron out such differences would be a big job, which would become even greater if the accounting treatment in Europe, South America, and countries such as Japan, were to be brought within its scope. Nevertheless, if such an effort is not made, at least to state and discuss the reasons for the differences, matters can only get worse and the world-wide status of the accounting profession will suffer correspondingly.

Taxation Cases

Full reports of the cases summarized in these columns will be published, with Notes on the Judgments, in the 'Annotated Tax Cases'

In re Midwood's Settlement

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division) June 19th, 1967

(Before Mr Justice Goff)

Estate duty — Settlement life policy — Included in settlement — To be held until maturity — Whether settlor had protected life interest in policy — Whether policy held for beneficiaries under referential trusts — Inland Revenue decline to appear.

In a marriage settlement the husband's fund was settled on a protected life interest for him, and then on an absolute interest for the wife. Subject thereto the husband had a power of appointment in favour of issue, and in default the fund was to be held for all or any of the children of the marriage who attained 21 or being female attained that age or married.

Included in the settlement was a policy of assurance on the husband's life, and the trustees were to hold the policy on trust to receive the policy money and invest it, and to hold the investments on the trusts of the husband's fund. The trustees had power to surrender or exchange the policy for a paid-up one maturing at the same time, and to sell or surrender any policy. The net proceeds of a sale or surrender were to be applied in taking out a single premium policy to mature at the same date as the policy sold or surrendered, or were to be accumulated until the date on which the policy sold or surrendered would have matured, and the accumulations were to be held 'upon the trusts hereinbefore declared'.

There were three children of the marriage, two of whom had attained vested interests. The wife died, and the husband afterwards released his power of appointment over the part of the fund represented by the policy.

The trustees took out a summons to determine whether, in the events that had happened, the husband had a protected life interest in the policy giving rise to a potential claim for estate duty, or whether the policy should be held for the children attaining vested interests in the husband's fund.

The Inland Revenue were invited to become parties to the summens and to argue the view most favourable to them, but they declined to do so.

Held: there was a clear intention to exclude the husband from any benefit in the policy, for the maturity of the policy was the determining factor in deciding who were the beneficiaries to take under the referential trusts; and that the policy and policy money should be held on trust to accumulate the income, if any, during the husband's lifetime, and then for the children who attained vested interests under the settlement.

In re Maryon-Wilson's Will Trusts

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division) July 6th, 1967

(Before Mr Justice Ungoed-Thomas)

Estate duty – Incidence – Duty on death of testator – Whether proportion to be borne by legatees – Duty on death of lifetenant – Whether legatees liable for proportion thereof – Finance Act 1894, sections 8, 9, 14.

In 1896 a testator bequeathed three legacies of £15,000 each subject to the prior interests of two successive lifetenants. He directed that all estate duty, if any, payable on his death should be borne by the devisees and legatees.

The testator died in 1897, the first life-tenant in 1944 and the second in 1965. The three legacies were held to be payable on the latter death, and it was not disputed that a proportion of the estate duty payable on that death was to be borne by the legatees. The questions now before the Court were whether the estate duty paid on the death of the testator, and that paid on the death of the first life-tenant were also to be borne by the legatees.

Held: (1) a proportion of the duty paid on the testator's death had to be borne by the legatees; (2) they were not liable to bear any part of the estate duty paid on the death of the first life-tenant.

Owen v. Pook

In the Court of Appeal - November 9th, 1967

Before the Master of the Rolls (Lord Denning), Lord Justice DIPLOCK and Lord Justice EDMUND DAVIES)

Income tax – Office or employment – expenses – Medical practitioner – Part-time appointment at hospital – General practice at residence – Travelling expenses between residence and hospital – Whether expenses deductible – Compensation against losses – Whether emolument – Income Tax Act 1952, Schedule 9, paragraph 7.

The taxpayer carried on practice as a general medical practitioner at his residence. He also held a part-time appointment as obstetrician and anaesthetist at a hospital about fifteen miles away. He was on stand-by duty at the hospital, as obstetrician one week-end a month, and as anaesthetist on two nights a week and one week-end a month. During those periods he had to be accessible by telephone. His responsibility for a patient began as soon as he received the telephone call. On receipt of the call he gave instructions to the hospital staff, and usually he then set out immediately by car for the hospital; but sometimes he advised treatment by telephone and awaited a further report. At times the telephone call was received when he was out on his rounds. He was also on call to attend obstetric emergency cases anywhere in the county at any time.

The taxpayer was assessed under Schedule E in respect of his emoluments from the hospital. He was paid travelling expenses at a fixed rate, but his actual expenses for 1962–63 and 1963–64 were greater than the sums he thus received. He claimed to be entitled to deduct the balance in computing his emoluments for the purpose of assessment under Schedule E. The General Commissioners decided in his favour.

Held: (the Master of the Rolls dissenting) (affirming the judgment of Mr Justice Stamp): the expenses in question were not imposed by the nature of the taxpayer's office or employment, but were personal to him, and were therefore not within paragraph 7 of Schedule 9 to the Income Tax Act 1952, and so were not deductible.

Roberts v. W.S. Electronics Ltd

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division) December 12th, 1967

(Before Mr Justice Cross)

Income tax – Action against a director and a manager – Sum received in settlement – Part paid for alleged diversion of goodwill – Whether that sum a capital or revenue receipt – Income Tax Act 1952, Schedule D.

The two shareholders in the respondent company sold their shares to another company, but one of them continued to be a director of the appellant company, and the other the executive directing manager. The appellant company instituted an action against those two persons, and alleged that they had utilized their respective offices to deprive the company of assets or to make secret profits (or both); had conducted the company's business for their own benefit; and had diverted the company's business and goodwill to other companies or firms in which they were financially interested.

The action was compromised by a payment of £19,000 to the company by the defendants. This sum was stated to be made up as to £11,000 in respect of the claim for alleged diversion of goodwill, £500 in respect of other matters, and £7,500 for costs. The company withdrew the allegations in its statement of claim.

It was contended for the company that the £11,000 should not be treated as income in computing a loss for the purposes of section 342 of the Income Tax Act 1952. It was contended for the Revenue that no permanent damage had occurred to the company's goodwill, and that the £11,000 was a capital receipt. The Commissioners decided in favour of the company.

Held: the £11,000 was a revenue receipt of the company.

Ralli Bros Trustee Company Limited v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division) July 31st, 1967

(Before Mr Justice Goff)

Estate duty – Gift inter vivos – Life policy – Covenant by settlor to bring policy into existence – First premium paid – Whether gift of policy or premium – Whether aggregable – Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1881, section 38 (2) (a) – Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1889, section 11 – Finance Act 1894, section 2 (1) (c), 4 – Finance Act 1950, section 18.

On August 16th, 1961, a settlor wrote to T, who was her man of business and was also the secretary of the company that she wished to take out policies on her life for the benefit of her five grandsons, and to purchase an annuity to make good the resulting loss of income. She wished the trustee company to be the trustee. On October 12th, 1961, the deceased made five settlements, all on the same form, whereby she covenanted to procure the issue in the name of the trustee company of a policy on her life, which would assure the payment of a specified sum at the end of ten years, or some other sum if she died in the meantime. The policy was to be held by the trustee company in trust for the grandsons in equal shares absolutely.

On the same day T signed a proposal form on behalf of the trustee company, and delivered the form to the insurance company on October 13th, together with a cheque for £159,142 os 7d drawn by Ralli Bros (Bankers) Ltd. The latter debited £159,142 os 7d to the account of Ralli Bros Ltd; and on the next day that company debited £176,800 5s to the settlor's account. The £176,800 5s represented £155,000, the total first premiums on the five policies, and £21,800 5s, the purchase price of the annuity. The £159,142 os 7d was the £176,800 5s, less £17,658 4s 5d, the commission payable by the insurance company to Ralli Bros Ltd. On October 13th, also, the insurance company issued the five policies, and they were delivered on or about November 30th, 1961.

The settlor died on December 24th, 1961, whereupon £100,000 became payable to the trustee company as trustee of the settlement which had been taken as an example of the others. This £100,000 was the amount of the first premium on the policy in that settlement.

The trustee company took out a summons to determine (1) whether the £100,000 was to be treated (a) as a gift of that sum, (b) as a gift of the policy; (2) if question (1) were answered as at (b), whether the £100,000 was aggregable or not.

Held: what the trustee company took was the policy, and not the money; and therefore the payment of the premium of £100,000 represented a gift, not of the money, but of the policy.

Finance and Commerce

Mercantile Credit

THE rise of over £1 million in the pre-tax profits of the Mercantile Credit group, shown in the accounts reprinted this week, stemmed from two sources: reduction in administrative costs and better profit margins. Better margins came from the lower cost of money and this Sir Mark Turner, the chairman, describes as 'the reverse side of the coin that we have known for the past few years where high interest rates have deprived us of profit margins which we could reasonably have expected at the time when business was undertaken'. The obverse side of the coin is once again uppermost and, with Bank rate at 8 per cent, profit margins this year have immediately suffered.

Rates have been increased to offset costs on future new business, but the group is faced with penal money costs on the current business portfolio. This is something that groups like Mercantile Credit have learned to live with over years of 'stop-go' and temporarily high interest rates - although not as high as they are now.

But Mercantile Credit has, in recent years, learned also to live with the need for administrative economies and these have clearly been achieved by a number of different means. In the first place, a policy of integration has meant more and more branch offices doing their business in the names of Mercantile Credit and of Mutual Finance (the banking subsidiary) rather than in the names of various hirepurchase subsidiaries. This process will be completed during the current year.

Simplification of procedures and administration in this way 'means a real contribution of saving in overheads', the chairman states. Another saving has been the elimination of direct financing of small transactions, while the gradual running-down of the Northern Accounting Ortice in Harrogate and the introduction of computer accounting for all transactions on the books have added to economies.

The older punched-card systems (run in parallel with the computer for some time) have been dispensed with and Sir Mark comments that 'not only have our best expectations of savings from a computer been realized, but, by its very existence, we have been able to handle a volume of business which would otherwise have required a large increase in staff'

Another contributor to improved profitability is the much better experience in bad and doubtful debts. On that point Sir Mark comments with a certain amount of feeling that 'there is no doubt that the experience of seven years ago taught us all a lesson which we shall not easily forget and business of all kinds now on our books is of a high quality'.

Seven years ago the group was not operating in some of its present spheres or was operating in them on a comparatively new and small scale. Personal loan business – in home loans and cars, for example – is considerably bigger now and Mercantile Credit has its car purchase schemes with the Automobile Association.

Leasing and factoring

Equipment leasing is a growing business and turnover in the year under review was a record £10.5 million 'despite a steadfast refusal to meet competition on terms which seemed unprofitable' – a comment which may be lined up with the lesson learnt seven years ago in the hire-purchase sphere. Investment allowances earned on leasing business have always been spread over the lease period.

Although investment allowances ceased in January 1966, £367,000 was brought to credit in 1966 and £329,000 in the past year. On present figures, £194,000 will be brought to credit in the current financial year and a further £260,000 over the next two years, after which the tax charge will not be significantly affected.

Under the cash grants system the company anticipates receiving £432,000 by way of grants on equipment bought during the past year, compared with £95,000 in the previous year when the new system started. These grants are being spread over the lease periods and £478,000 has been carried forward in investment grants equalization account.

A decision to enter the factoring field through Mercantile Credit (Factors) has proved justified and the accounting service which this company provides has been transferred to the computer, resulting in a more comprehensive service to clients.

Protection of depositors

The accounts and accompanying notes are drawn up not only to comply with the Companies Act 1948 but also with the Protection of Depositors (Accounts) Regulations 1963. The detail required under the latter regulations is contained in Note 16 to the accounts and, in the original, these notes cover two quarto pages.

Also covering two pages in the report is a 'Tenyear consolidated balance sheet and profit statement 1958–1967' and in this record the experience of seven years ago sticks out like the proverbial sore thumb. But over the ten years, employed capital has risen from £23.25 million to £121.49 million, net hire-purchase and instalment debts from £23.34 million to £83.16 million, loans and other debts from £357,000 to £16.96 million and pre-tax profits from £968,000 to £3.74 million.

Under current economic conditions and under the conditions likely to develop from the enforced cuts forecast in consumer and capital spending, Mercantile Credit will do well to achieve current year profits within touching distance of the past year's. The root problem nationally, as Sir Mark comments, is 'whether the time which we have bought through devaluation can give us the breathing space we need to tackle the basic economic problems with which we are faced, or whether it will be wastefully frittered away'.

The unearned charges and interest shown in the balance sheet have been calculated as heretofore by exclibiting an appropriate part of rotal charges and interest to instalments receivable after the date of the balance sheet covering financing and collection costs and future profit. The separate figures of unearned charges and of unearned interest are shown in note 16 (e), page [56]. Loans and other debts

The directors are of the opinion that coincidence of the financial year of the subsidiaries in South Africa, Rhodesia and East Africa with that of the parent company would delay the submission of these consolidated accounts. Therefore the figures incorporated therein in respect of those subsidiaries are made up to 30th June, 1967.

CITY NOTES

WHILE waiting for the Government to make up its collective and distraught mind about the shape of its new expenditure policies, the stock-market has been able to turn its own mind to its old love – the take-over and merger scene. The Rio Tinto-Zinc Corporation-Borax operation was particularly helpful since it brought to life a merger operation which looked dead only a few months back.

Naturally this has led to much conjecture about the possibility of other old, and even discarded, merger ideas coming to life again. Take-over operations and conjectures have helped to keep interest in equities lively when otherwise there might have been more concentration on the possibilities of Government retrenchment.

There is, however, a noticeable disinclination to sell equities even at present prices and even in face of doleful forecasts of restrictions. That is sound enough on the view that the Government's intention is to make room for higher industrial investment, production and exports.

But the shape of the expenditure cuts rather than the extent of the cuts is an important factor in the stockmarket equation, and there is more likely to be a case for holding equities at present prices if the shape is wrong than if the shape is right. A wrong shape will rekindle inflationary doubts and, as the equity markets showed in 1967, doubts about inflation are the strongest possible influence on equity share prices.

THE City Working Party drawing up the new code of take-over and merger conduct is expected to put forward its new set of rules by the end of the month. It is already known that the new code will be something more than the old one in that its observation will be enforced by a judgement panel under the chairmanship of Sir Humphrey Mynors. A present suggestion is that further moves for enforcement of the new code will come by making acceptance of it a condition of the granting of a share quotation by the Stock Exchange. Breaking the code would then carry the final penalty of suspension of share dealings. The presence of such a penalty would almost certainly be enough to ensure non-violation.

THERE are now sure signs that the insurance industry is gradually moving out of its long sojourn in the wilderness of poor underwriting experience. The sojourn has proved long enough for the industry to take a long hard look at its own internal operation. There has been much reorganization and much investment in new administrative techniques and the industry is all the more efficient for it. This effort ought to be rewarded by more favourable underwriting conditions and if it is, then the rewards could prove extremely worth while.

N the foreign exchange market sterling now seems at long last to have found its post-devaluation level and there are indications that a greater degree of confidence – or a lesser degree of non-confidence – plus Bank rate at 8 per cent, is beginning to attract funds to London. Whether the trickle can be encouraged into a flow still depends to a considerable extent on the shape of Government economic policy in the immediate future, but it is not beyond the bounds of possibility that Bank rate could come down from 8 per cent within the next few weeks irrespective of the rise in interest rates in the United States. Developments there have certainly meant the 8 per cent Bank rate remaining in operation much longer than most people anticipated at the time of devaluation last November. A strong flow of funds to London, given appropriate Government policies, could allow a marginal Bank rate reduction before long.

Examination, October 1967, held by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales; The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland.

The Examination Committee reported the results of the above examination as follows:

Passed 32 Referred 7 Failed 23

Candidates were informed by post of their results on December 15th, 1967, and a list of successful candidates was published on December 21st,

The performance in the examination as a whole of the seven candidates shown above as having been referred was such that they are being permitted to present themselves on one occasion only at a later examination in the paper in which they have not attained the required standard. They will be regarded as successful in the examination as a whole if they pass the referred paper at this later sitting. FINDINGS AND DECISIONS OF THE DISCIPLINARY COMMITTEE

Finding and Decision of the Disciplinary Committee of the Council of the Institute at a hearing held on December 5th, 1967

A formal complaint was preferred by the Investigation Committee of the Council of the Institute to the Disciplinary Committee of the Council that Paul David Kearsley whilst a clerk under articles was at a Magistrate's Court on July 14th, 1967, convicted of stealing three-quarters of a gallon of petrol, value 4s 3d, the property of the Postmaster-General, and was fined £20, so as to render himself liable to be declared unfit to become a member of the Institute or to be reprimanded or admonished. The Committee found that the formal complaint against Paul David Kearsley had been proved and the Committee ordered that Paul David Kearsley of 43 Swann Lane, Cheadle Hulme, Cheshire, a former clerk under articles to a member of the Institute, be declared unfit to become a member of the Institute.

Findings and Decisions of the Disciplinary Committee of the Council of the Institute at hearings held on December 6th, 1967

A formal complaint was preferred by the Investigation Committee of the Council of the Institute to the Disciplinary Committee of the Council that David Raymond Carston, a fellow of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, had been guilty of acts or defaults discreditable to a member of the Institute within the meaning of clause 21 sub-clause (3) of the supplemental Royal Charter in that he signed the Accountants Certificates required by section 30 of the Solicitors Act 1957, relating to the practice of a solicitor for the accounting periods January 1st to December 31st, 1961, January 1st to December 31st, 1962, January 1st to December 31st, 1963, and January 1st, 1964, to March 1st, 1965, which he knew or which he ought to have known were not correct, so as to render himself liable to be excluded or suspended from membership of the Institute or to be reprimanded or admonished. The Committee found that the formal complaint against David Raymond Carston, F.C.A., had been proved and the Committee ordered that David Raymond Carston, F.C.A., of 2 Museum Place, Cardiff, be reprimanded.

A formal complaint was preferred by the Investigation Committee of the Council of the Institute to the Disciplinary Committee of the Council that Bruce Martin Wilden, an associate of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, had been guilty of acts or defaults discreditable to a member of the Institute within the meaning of Clause 21 sub-clause (3) of the supplemental Royal Charter in that (a) during December 1966 and/or January 1967 he solicited or attempted to solicit professional work from a limited company. X and/or a second limited company Y while employed by or acting in association with the accountants to those companies (b) he had used notepaper on which his firm was described as 'Business Administration Consultants' (c) he failed to reply or take any action in response to two letters addressed to him by an Assistant Secretary of the Institute dated respectively May 3rd, 1967, and June 26th, 1967, so as to render himself liable to be excluded or suspended from membership of the Institute or to be reprimanded or admonished. The Committee found that the formal complaint against Bruce Martin Wilden, A.C.A., had been proved under all headings and the Committee ordered that Bruce Martin Wilden, A.C.A., of 10 Beaufort Gardens, Knightsbridge, London SW3, be reprimanded.

A formal complaint was preferred by the Investigation Committee of the Council of the Institute to the Disciplinary Committee of the Council that a fellow of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales had been guilty of acts or defaults discreditable to a member of the Institute within the meaning of Clause 21 subclause (3) of the supplemental Royal Charter in that having acted as accountant to a certain company he failed within a reasonable time and despite repeated requests and a specific undertaking given to the Institute to make available to the said company's present accountants certain information required by them relating to the tax and other affairs of the said company, so as to render himself liable to be excluded or suspended from membership of the Institute or to be reprimanded or admonished. The Committee found that the formal complaint had been proved and the Committee ordered that the member be admonished but considered that there existed special circumstances justifying the omission of his name from the publication of the Finding and Decision.

FINDING OF THE DISCIPLINARY COMMITTEE AND DECISION OF THE APPEAL COMMITTEE

Finding of the Disciplinary Committee of the Council of the Institute at a hearing held on September 26th, 1967, and Decision of the Appeal Committee of the Council of the Institute at a hearing held on December 12th, 1967

A formal complaint was preferred by the Investigation Committee of the Council of the Institute to the Disciplinary Committee of the Council that Leonard Francis Freeman, a fellow of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, had been guilty of acts or defaults discreditable to a member of the Institute within the meaning of sub-clause (3) of Clause 21 of the supplemental Royal Charter in that (a) he failed to pay the subscription payable by him under Clause 11 of the supplemental Royal Charter and Bye-law 41 in respect of the year 1967 for four months after the same became due (b) he failed to ensure that sufficient funds were available to meet the

FINDING AND DECISION OF THE APPEAL COMMITTEE

Finding and Decision of the Appeal Committee of the Council of the Institute at a hearing held on December 12th, 1967 of sub-clause (3) of Clause 21 of the supplemental Royal Charter in that he procured the publication in the issue of a daily newspaper published on May 2nd, 1967, of an advertisement for staff in a form which was in breach of the recommendations made by the Council and reproduced in sections E3 and E4 of the Members' Handbook of the Institute notwithstanding that his attention had been previously drawn by an Assistant Secretary of the Institute to the fact that an advertisement in a similar form of which he had procured the publication in the same newspaper had been in breach of such recommendations, so as to render himself liable to be excluded or suspended from membership of the Institute or to be reprimanded or admonished. The Committee affirmed the Finding of the Disciplinary Committee that the formal complaint against Rahim Ahmed Jan, F.C.A., had been proved and the Committee also affirmed the Decision of the Disciplinary Committee that Rahim Ahmed Jan, F.C.A., of P.O. Approaching the Stock-market

by JOHN FULLER

ALTHOUGH bureaucratic controls seem increasingly to infringe the freedom of the subject to pursue life in his own way, there still remains an area in which the enterprising can enjoy considerable room for manœuvre.

This is the stock-market. There are always men – and in this context men includes women – who seek to make optimum use of their resources, who are ready to pit their wits against their fellow men and who are prepared to put their capital at risk.

But the investment field is a happy grazing ground for statute-hungry politicians. 'Find-out-what-they're-doingand-stop-them' might be the battle cry of self-styled purposeful legislators, with the result that a plethora of restrictive legislation is inflicted on the public.

Elementary signposts

Nothing is certain in this uncertain world, and it is incumbent on anyone about to assail the world of investment for the first time to heed certain elementary signposts if some of the more obvious pitfalls are to be avoided.

It is a generally-accepted principle that it is unwise for an investor to enter the equity market without first holding some National Savings investments and/or cash backing appropriate to his circumstances. To acquire marketable securities that are vulnerable to price movements determined by the law of supply and demand should be a medium or long-term exercise. For if an early sale is necessary to meet personal commitments, a needless and discouraging loss will result when share prices are temporarily depressed.

The virtue of having a wide spread of investments was underlined when the Rolls Razor Company crashed. One unit trust held a long line of shares in the company and, over a very short period, witnessed the value of its holding reduced to an all-round figure. But unlike the small investor who had put all his eggs in one basket (and there were probably many), the unit trust had only a tiny percentage of its funds invested in the company and consequently shrugged off the loss with an insignificant shaving of the price of the unit.

The moral is clear: if the available capital is insufficient to split between a number of shareholdings, it should be directed initially towards unit trusts or investment trusts – or kept liquid until such time as it can meet this prudent requirement of modest spread. Contrariwise, it would be foolish to splinter resources between too many shares. Adequate surveillance over a personal portfolio is both interesting and time-consuming, but an excessive number of small holdings can over-extend an individual's capacity and cost of dealing can be proportionately higher than by acquiring fewer investments.

Acceptance of personal responsibility is an essantial ingredient in the efficient management of investments. To equip oneself properly demands an intelligent interest in the financial Press, and the wider the reading the better prepared an investor should be to make the right decision at the right time.

Lend a ready ear to the opinions of others, but be careful not to accept without reservation all the advice proffered. Moreover, beware of the outwardly over-confident character who delights in chronicling his own 100 per cent success story with an air of unrestrained assurance; self-adulation and dogmatic assertion may mask limited knowledge and certain failures.

Listen and learn, then, but rely on your own judgment as the final arbiter. To follow blindly recommendations from an unproved source is a dangerous policy, and those who are prone to be weak in this respect should surrender their decision-making to the professional managers of unit trusts and investment trusts.

What should an investor look for in seeking the best outlets for his capital? First, he must decide on what he wants; his aspirations, set against his personal circumstances — particularly his tax position — should indicate fairly clearly the type of portfolio at which to aim. This can only be achieved after asking many questions and thinking hard and long. Then his thoughts can turn to the particular area of industry to which he is prepared to commit his funds.

The dividend yield, dividend cover, assets value, capital gearing and comparison with other companies engaged in similar business are basic factors for consideration. Remember that as a general rule high yields point to high risks. On the other hand, an inordinately low yield may discount the future too far ahead; after all, a chap doesn't marry a girl because she will make a good grandmother.

The establishment by a company of an above-average record over a number of years is usually a good guideline – subject to the caveat that indefinite continuance of the good performance is not guaranteed. The quality of managements, and business conditions outside their control, are always liable to change.

Flexible approach

A recognition that change is a happening always just around the corner points to the need for a flexible approach. The fortunes of any industry are vulnerable to changes in public taste, competition from unexpected quarters, appearance of alternative products and changes in governmental policies. Personal circumstances might also dictate a sale and reinvestment in a more suitable security; what is appropriate for the middle-aged family man is not necessarily the ideal investment for retirement. The need to switch must be acknowledged when conditions so determine and any ensuing loss accepted with the traditional stiff

But the bulldog spirit is quite irrelevant if it means retaining one's investment teeth in a company whose glories lie solely in the past and is now labouring with little prospect in a depressed industry. Better establish a tax-loss and take the existing market price before the bottom of the market falls out. And when you feel the level of prices is too high and cannot be sustained, consider going partially liquid by disposing of investments that appear over-valued.

A declining market sometimes leads to precipitate selling. The jettisoning of sound shares can be costly, for apart from selling expenses the loss can be really material if the shares are bought back – in this case there will be further expenses. The jobbers' turn – the difference between the bid and offer prices – is another factor; and, of course, there is no guarantee that the repurchase will be effected at a low enough price to more than offset these costs and thus justify the whole operation.

It is usually good practice to retain either a free cash surplus or an unused or under-used bank overdraft facility which is readily available, to take advantage of investment opportunities or for taking up rights where desirable. Such cash balances are best left in a bank deposit account or invested in building society shares.

It is here pertinent to mention the oft-heard phrase of 'rights issued on favourable terms'. The parrot cry of the innocent, it presumably refers to the price of the rights being pitched substantially below the market price; but it ignores the market adjustment that follows to make full allowance for the new issue. However, the announcement that a company intends to make such an issue often indicates confidence of the directors in the future of the business, and the additional shares make for improved marketability.

Just as it is folly to be mesmerized by the apparent inevitability of gains during a sustained 'bull' market, so it is easy to be unduly influenced by hackneyed sayings. For example, advice to 'average' relies on the false dogma that a loss already sustained is reduced by buying further shares in the same company at a lower price. In fact, no additional purchase makes the slightest difference to the profit or loss on the original holding, and to suggest that a bookloss can be ameliorated by averaging is to acknowledge a procedure as phoney as a glass eye.

A desire to employ one's personal resources profitably is both natural and sensible. The stock-market provides a suitable vehicle but a serious approach is essential if heart-breaking experiences are to be avoided. Confrontation with the demon inflation can be exhilarating and rewarding.

Estate duty is a voluntary tax

That is, the decision rests entirely with the individual.

One of our functions, as life assurance brokers, is to devise schemes whereby estate duty becomes much less of a burden. In addition (i) cash can become immediately available at death and (ii) annuity policies during one's lifetime can increase net income.

No two estates are exactly the same —but here is a case history in point:

A man with an estate of £150,000 increased his net spendable income by nearly £5,000 per annum and the capital passing on death by nearly £30,000 after taking the steps we recommended.

INTERNAL AUDIT— WITH A DIFFERENCE

The difference being that we don't burden our auditors with month after month of endless routine checking — we are rather more concerned with periodic checking allied to examination of existing methods, records and clerical and accounting procedures. These operations are playing an increasingly important part in our computerisation programme following the installation of our IBM 360/30. This means that they are almost as concerned with organisation and methods as they are with accounting. For this reason the young men we appoint will have lively enquiring minds and the ability to see problems clearly and tackle them in a systematic way.

One of the posts we are filling will require previous experience in audit work and the other in a general accounting environment, preferably in a commercial organisation.

There are excellent prospects within the company – the person vacating one of these posts has just been promoted to systems analyst in our Data Processing department – and we offer an excellent starting salary. There is also a contributory superannuation fund, luncheon vouchers, five-day week and three weeks' holiday this year.

If this appeals to you and if you are now between intermediate and final stages of A.C.A., A.C.W.A. or A.C.C.A., why not write to me, giving some brief details about yourself including your present salary level.

It's because we've been first so often that we come second so often.

"... never the blushing bride"

The Leicester Permanent is often a jump ahead. (When other societies were wondering about computers, we were installing one!) You'd think that this progressive attitude would make us everybody's first choice.

Not so.

Naturally enough, many people make their first investment with their local society. Or the one with a branch nearby.

Or the one where they've known the manager for donkey's years.

But when they're looking for a good second string, they realise our reputation for being first must mean something!

To all those in search of a primer on the levy provisions of The Land Commission Act 1967, this work can be confidently recommended.

The Financial Times, December 4th, 1967 The Land Commission Act 1967 – even ignoring the many regulations already made under it – covers some 189 pages with extraordinarily abstruse language. What then is the busy man to do who wants to find out quickly what the levy is all about and how it works? One very good answer is to acquire a copy of this handy paperback which, in 120 pages, gives a succinct account of the principal provisions, with appropriately illuminating examples.

Commentary by the Chairman SIR CUTHBERT B. CLEGG, T.D.

An Eventful Year

Sir Cuthbert B. Clegg, T.D., Chairman of Martins Bank Limited, in the course of his statement, which has been circulated to the shareholders with the Statement of Accounts, said:-

On 9th December last the Board announced that it had set in hand a detailed study to determine whether or not a merger or other form of association with another bank would be in the public interest and the best interests of the bank and its shareholders. At the time of writing I am not in a position to add anything to the statement already released, but a further announcement will be made as soon as this is nossible. as soon as this is possible.

In the meantime I am pleased to be able to tell shareholders that the bank conto tell shareholders that the bank con-tinued to make good progress in 1967. Last year I reported an increase in the number of our customers of more than 5 per cent; this year the increase has been over 6 per cent, a most creditable achieve-ment in the prevailing economic un-certainty. This has been reflected in a very encouraging increase in our deposits which, at a record figure of £510 million, are £38 million more than a year ago. It are £38 million more than a year ago. It is vital that we maintain the growth of deposits if we are to be able to finance the essential needs of industry and commerce.

At the year end our advances stood at £264 million; this was an increase of £37 million over the 1966 Balance Sheet figure but the average level of our advances showed little change against the previous year. Following the relaxation of some of the Government control measures in the action rate of the garden was the previous to be the Government control measures in the earlier part of the year we were able to be a little more generous in our lending, although we continued to give precedence to those sectors accorded priority by Government policy. However, in November a new ceiling for advances was imposed as part of the Government's devaluation measures.

Our contribution to the finance of exports this year has been very considerexports this year has been very considerable and we have seen a substantial increase both in the provision of and commitments for medium-term finance. We have also taken our part in the Export Credits Guarantee Department's new short-term schemes providing finance for exports with credit periods of up to two years. The total under both headings is at present £19 million, with commitments standing at a further £31 million; all of this is at preferential interest rates to the exporter and represents a considerable contribution by the bank to the national export effort, particularly at this time of high interest rates.

During the year the banks have agreed high interest rates.

During the year the banks have agreed to provide medium-term finance to shipowners, also at preferential rates of interest, against guarantees from the Ministry of Technology. These arrangements form part of the Government's measures to aid the shipbuilding industry and we have already agreed to provide substantial facilities under this scheme.

We have continued to give strong sup-substantial racilities under this scheme.

We have continued to give strong support to the agricultural industry and have asked our managers to give special consideration to those farmers whose stocks have been lost through foot and mouth

The net profit of the group for the year was £2,876,927 after Corporation Tax at 40 per cent and 42½ per cent for the appropriate periods, and after transfers to inner reserves; the corresponding figure for 1966 was £3,094,190. The fall was due to several factors, the principal items being lower average interest rates and an increase in expenses, nctably Selective Employment Tax and increased staff

We paid an interim dividend of 7½ per cent on 31st July, 1967, and the Directors recommend a final dividend of 7½ per cent which makes 15 per cent for the year against the figure of 14¾ per cent, to which we were limited last year for the reason I then explained. then explained.

From our investment in the equity of Mercantile Credit Company Limited we have received total dividends of 20 per cent. This is one of the leading hire purchase concerns in the country, and in February the bank took up at par its allotment of £1,770,425 7c, per cent Convertible Unsecured Subcrdinated Loan Stock 1987/92 in the company.

Sale of Lewis's Bank Limited

In July we sold Lewis's Bank Limited to Lloyds Bank Limited for £3,200,000; although we were reluctant to sever our connection with Lewis's Bank, which had been a wholly owned subsidiary since July, 1958, it was considered desirable that control should rest with the bankers to the Lewis's Stores group, the ownership of which had earlier changed hands.

New Ventures

New Ventures

In August, we acquired a 75 per cent interest in Unicorn Securities Limited and Dillon Walker and Company Limited, respectively the managers and the share distributors of the Unicorn Group of Unit Trusts. This Group, now renamed Martins Unicorn, is well established with an excellent reputation, having been a pioneer in the post-war development of Unit Trusts. The Group already has in issue over £50,000,000 worth of trust units, and has shown, by its introduction of £20. and has shown, by its introduction of £20 Bonds and the outstanding response to the new Financial Trust, that it has a active and forward-looking sales policy.

Another innovation was the incorporation in November of Martins Bank Trust Company Limited with a paid-up capital of £1 million. This commenced operations on 1st January, 1968, and is initially concerned with undertaking responsibility for the bank's trustee, investment and personal taxation services, company registration and Unit Trust interests. It is intended that the company will eventually undertake a number of additional activities which will enable it to offer a company will even the company will even to the company will even the company will enable to offer a company will enable it to offer a company company to the company will be set to the company to the comp still more comprehensive service in the fields of investment management and personal financial planning.

As anticipated in my commentary last year, Martins Bank (Finance) Limited commenced business in April. It has a paid-up capital of £1 million and has continued the function formerly carried out by Lewis's Bank, of accepting large sterling deposits for fixed periods at special rates of interest. Some of these funds have been lent to Martins Bank and others used for medium-term lending. It has also been active in the Euro-currency markets.

The bank has joined fourteen leading European and United States banks in forming a new company, Compagnie Internationale de Crédit à Moyen Terme Internationale de Crédit à Moyen Terme S.A. We feel the company will fulfil a most useful purpose in providing mediumterm finance through access to international financial markets. Our Finance Company has agreed to provide substantial credit facilities to this new company, which will carry out its financing activities by buying and placing in the international market promissory notes with maturities of two to five years issued by borrowing companies. by borrowing companies.

The past year has also seen our association with the American Express Company in the issue over the bank counters of their sterling credit cards and with the Royal Insurance Group in the provision of facilities to policy-holders for the extended payment of premiums.

Computer Integration
Our new Computer Centre at Bucklersbury House in the City of London has now been fully equipped and, in addition to handling cheques received from the Central Clearing House, has started to process the accountancy work of the central London branches; plans for offering new customer services are well advanced. We are also studying closely the system by which all our branches will be brought on to computer operation.

Improved Services

The Post Office Giro will commence operations in the Autumn of 1968 and we have given careful consideration to the manner in which its operation could affect our existing and future business. affect our existing and future business. We have co-operated fully with other banks in the production of the recently published booklet on Bank Money Transfer Services and in the establishment of the proposed Inter-Bank Computer Bureau for the exchange of magnetic tapes between banks, and between banks and their customers. We believe that the bank giro credit transfer and the direct debiting systems are fully competitive with those systems are fully competitive with those to be offered by the National Giro, and we are confident of our ability to give a better banking service.

The Banking service.

The Bankers Card which we introduced in 1966 has proved increasingly popular with customers as have our new 24-hour cash dispensing machines, more of which are to be provided in 1968; meanwhile we are constantly seeking new methods of improving still further our normal counter service.

Bank Charges

During the year the Prices and Incomes Board Report on bank charges was published. Although it concluded that there was little to criticise in the existing levels was little to criticise in the existing levels of bank charges, the Report ranged over a far wider field than would appear to have been required by the initial brief and contained many criticisms and suggestions, some of which related to matters aiready under discussion before the Report was called for. The clearing banks have submitted to the authorities their views on the recommendations made in the Report and we look forward to further discussions on ve look forward to further discussions on

Staff

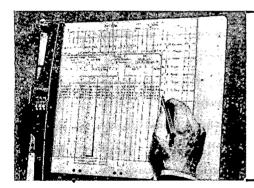

It has been an eventful year, too, in staff matters. A large proportion of our staff belongs to Martins Bank Staff Association which is accorded full negotiating rights with provision for resort to arbitration should the necessity arise. A smaller proportion, but nevertheless a considerable number in aggregate, belongs to the National Union of Bank Employees. In July prolonged negotiations for the establishment of national negotiating machinery between the clearing banks, the Central Council of Bank Staff Associations and the National Union of Bank Employees broke down. The bank had supported participation in such machinery, as had Martins Bank Staff Association, but we withdrew when it was clear that there was insufficient support from the other banks and their staff association. the other banks and their staff associ-ations. Talks have now been resumed and it is hoped that a solution satisfactory to all parties will be achieved as we deeply regretted any reduction in our standard of service caused by the recent strikes.

Devaluation and the Economy

In the wider field of the national economy it has been a depressing year, economy it has been a depressing year, culminating in the devaluation of the pound in November. Devaluation, however, is only a recognition that our money is not worth as much internationally as it was—it is not in itself a cure for the country's economic sickness. Such an adjustment can do no more than provide opportunities for us to overcome our problems by our own efforts and sacrifices.

No free economy can function success-No free economy can function successfully if the rewards of enterprise are kept in check and if business and industrial growth is stultified by excessive legislation and controls. There must be a removal of disincentives and the restoration of positive spurs to increased efficiency and greater enterprise. In this way business confidence—and without it there will be no investment for the future—will be restored and the economy will progress.

CAN WE HELP YOU CLOSE THE GAP?

Pulling together the threads of control in business is the Accountants concern. This is particularly relevant at the present time with regard to Payroll. It is time now to change and to streamline. Paragon suggest you examine the Manicopy 3-in-1 Payroll System for this application, where the Earnings Card, Pay Slip and Payroll Summary are prepared at only one writing on a Manicopy Recorder.

If your payroll records are written by hand you must save time and money with Manicopy. If your system is mechanised you may still save in the limited sector of executives' monthly salaries.

If ever there was a time to cut costs surely it is NOW.

New Taxes For Old

THE extent of the cuts in Government expenditure, coupled with the 'agonizing reappraisal' of priorities preceding the PRIME MINISTER's statement last Tuesday, merely served to confirm that any slackening in the growth of public sector expenditure will be short-lived. While in due course more may be done to ensure that the taxpayer gets value for money, hopes that Government expenditures can be cut to relieve the taxpayer are futile.

Rising outlays apart, the fact is that Britain's tax system is not well designed to meet the need for revenues adequate to cover the Government's growing needs. Evasion and avoidance are merely symptoms – just as are the frequent complaints of taxpayers about their 'burdens' – of the need to overhaul the revenue-raising machine. Whatever may be the case in equity for tax rates such as characterize the surtax or estate duty in Britain, they reflect an absence of realism concerning human nature and taxable capacity. Likewise the current treatment of close corporations, which are even only moderately successful, cannot be justified on rational economic grounds.

Resentment over the weight of direct taxation in Britain has been reflected in the considerable support for proposals to shift the distribution of taxation from direct to indirect, and for some time past the advocates of such a policy have been pressing the merits of the added-value tax on the Treasury. This support stems primarily from two considerations: the need for larger revenues and the need to harmonize the tax system with that of the member countries of the European Economic Community, if and when Britain is admitted.

Existing disparities between the British and European tax systems are well brought out in a new Chatham House – Political and Economic Planning pamphlet entitled Taxes in the E.E.C. and Britain: The Problem of Harmonization. The authors – Professor D. Dosser and Mr S. S. Han of the University of York – emphasize the serious differences between the United Kingdom and E.E.C. tax structures, particularly in the field of indirect taxation. The gradual adoption of a uniform T.V.A.-type tax has been accompanied elsewhere – in Denmark and recently in Sweden – by similar moves.

The significance of this development is clear. If, as the P.E.P. pamphlet makes clear, Britain still hopes to join the European Common Market, then she will have to harmonize her tax structure with that of the E.E.C. As far as direct taxation is concerned the pace of harmonization is slow and Britain may yet have an opportunity of influencing future developments. But as far as indirect taxes go, it is clear that the United Kingdom has to follow the E.E.C. pattern, more particularly the T.V.A.

To this particular end it is suggested that the British purchase tax should be brought gradually into line with the T.V.A. Unfortunately, the two taxes are as different in conception and operation as they could be. A virtual flat-rate T.V.A. compares with a differential purchase tax. The latter reflects the 'social' objectives of differentiating against 'luxuries'; in the E.E.C. the T.V.A. is regarded simply as a means of raising revenue. At first sight, a switch to T.V.A. would reduce the progressiveness of the British tax system.

Yet, as the authors rightly imply, are radio and TV sets, any more than motor-cars or cosmetics and jewellery, bought only by the rich in Britain? The changing expenditure pattern of the British public would surely justify such a changeover. On the other hand, there is no doubt that the adoption of the T.V.A. would raise prices and in all probability lead to further wage and salary claims. The 'social' exemptions, for example, of foodstuffs, in the purchase tax are not matched in the T.V.A.

The real attraction of a broadly based T.V.A. is its revenue potential. Accordingly, making the appropriate adjustments to the data, the authors calculate that a 15 per cent T.V.A. (the rate mooted for the E.E.C.) on a similar tax base would yield in the United Kingdom some £3,050 million! Compared with the prospective yield this year of some £735 million from purchase tax, the attractions of the T.V.A. for freespending governments are obvious!

If harmonization within the E.E.C. were necessary, then the United Kingdom would have to abandon the selective employment tax since it runs counter to the E.E.C. philosophy of tax neutrality on internationally traded goods. Employee and employer contributions to the National Insurance scheme would need to be raised if Britain enters the E.E.C., but this could be offset by reductions in income taxation. In the field of company taxation, the United Kingdom discrimination against distributed profits conflicts sharply with E.E.C. practice and, in the opinion of the authors, 'presents an intractable problem'.

However, quite apart from entry into Europe, changes are urgently needed and this P.E.P. pamphlet is valuable in indicating the patterns which Mr Jenkins should now be considering.

Another Lost Opportunity

"HE only relevant criterion against which the proposed expenditure cuts announced by the PRIME MINISTER on Tuesday should be judged is the extent to which they will free resources and ensure that an export-led reflation will not engender internal pressures generating a further bout of inflation. Cuts in public sector outlays are merely the reverse side of the Budget coin, i.e. increases in taxation. But whereas the latter fall on the private sector, the former should fall on the public sector.

Looking at the White Paper, Public Expenditure in 1968-69 and 1969-70 (Cmnd 3515, H.M.S.O., 189d), in the immediate aftermath of the PREMIER's statement, it was difficult to resist the conclusion that a large part of the electorate will be left wondering what all the fuss at No. 10 during the previous week was about. And those who hoped that for once the Government would swallow its own medicine, will hardly be impressed by savings of £300 million next year and £416 million in 1969-70 out of proposed outlays amounting to £15,378 million and £15,628 million in those two years.

Much more to the point, however, is the question whether the proposed cuts are likely to contribute to converting the British economy into a viable and dynamic undertaking. The only cuts which will have the effect of releasing some resources are the prescriptions charge, the extra shilling on the National Insurance contribution and the loss of secondary school milk which will hit the farmers more than the scholars.

All the remaining proposals will take time to make their impact. For example, despite the soul-searching that undoubtedly accompanied the defence cuts, in terms of savings they produce nothing in 1968-69 and only £110 million in 1969-70. The loss of £80 million of investment grants and £53 million on roads are significant not so much for their immediate effect but their implications for the future. The decision to cut back the housing programme and defer the increase in the school-leaving age - regrettable as they may be in themselves - are of little relevance to the immediate problem which is to ensure that British industry starts increasing its exports as from now!

Having failed to make such announcements when they should have been made in order to ensure the maximum impact, the Government might just as well have deferred them for an early Budget. After all, without Mr Jenkins's proposals it is virtually impossible to judge the role these latest changes will play in refurbishing the economy. An obvious point is the fact that while the Government intends to implement the promise of an extra 75 weekly in family allowances, the higher-paid parent will lose the benefit through adjustment of tax allowances.

In short, a final judgement on the Government's post-devaluation economic policy must await the Budget. What can be said at the moment, however, is that the Government has lost yet another opportunity for impressing the electorate with a genuine effort to pull the economy round.

Current Affairs

Industrial Expansion

NOTHING has contributed more to the present conflict of opinion between organized industry and the Government than the latter's avowed intention to introduce legislation to assist financially in the modernization and technological advance of industry and in the expansion of its capacity. To industry such legislation takes on the guise of a monster Trojan horse.

In a White Paper, Industrial Expansion (Cmnd 3509), published on Tuesday, the Government has sought to explain its intentions more explicitly and thereby allay the deep-rooted suspicion of many industrialists. According to the White Paper, the sole object of the exercise is to ensure that Government funds made available to industry for the 'more rapid application of advanced technology' or the provision of 'financial support', or 'financial assistance' for industry, is to establish 'a rigorous, independent and consistent system of appraisal for these cases to ensure that Government help is provided fairly and economically'.

While details of how these desirable objectives were to be achieved awaited publication of the actual Bill after we went to press, the White Paper stated categorically that the Bill would confer 'no compulsory powers. Nor does the Government intend to 'acquire shares freely in the market'; at most it may 'in some circumstances' take a preference shareholding. The White Paper may relieve some doubts but many people in industry will take the view that the proof of the pudding is in the eating.

Restrictive Practices

MAJOR factor in post-war inflation has been the pressure of demand for labour of all kinds. In conditions of expansion, Britain's scarcest resource is labour; therefore it behoves the nation to make the most effective use of the labour available to it. This can be achieved by facilitating the mobility of labour between different industries, and within the same industries between different types of work.

The realities of the situation, however, fall considerably short of this desirable state. Restrictive practices are widespread, ranging from demarcation practices operated by members of the craft unions such as those in the shipbuilding and building industries, to the restrictions on entry to certain trades because of excessive periods of apprenticeship. Nor is it only in the craft unions that such practices abound. Many of the practices of professional bodies are designed largely to protect the members' monopoly rights; and in industry and trade, too, restraints on competition are widespread.

For all that restrictive practices are widespread, precise information about their extent is surprisingly limited and Mr John A. Lincoln in a new study entitled The Restrictive Society (Allen & Unwin, price 30s) has been forced to rely largely on Press reports and excerpts from some official reports. Mr Lincoln may well be right when he implies that at all levels, from employers to the Ministry of Labour, even those who have to tolerate such practices are not anxious to encourage public discussion and risk provoking labour disputes.

The author contends that sweeping away such restraints and allowing competitive forces to operate freely would substantially increase the national product. At the moment the Government is waiting for the report of the Royal Commission on Trades Unions and Employers' Associations. If precedent is any guide it is unlikely that the report will indict such practices. Even if a majority report were to urge action, it is far from clear how the Government could deal with intransigent labour. It is all very well for Mr Lincoln to advocate enforcement of the Common Law principle on restraint of trade in all its guises, the problem of the unofficial strike is not so easily resolved. This is not to assert, however, that Mr Lincoln has not done a service in publicizing just what does go on in some sectors of British industry.

Investment Grants for New Ships

N the light of experience in dealing with claims and inquiries relating to investment grants for new ships, Mr Anthony Crosland, President of the Board of Trade, has decided that certain types of case shall in future be subject to special scrutiny.

This scrutiny will apply to all cases involving the acquisition of a new ship by a company controlled by persons resident outside the United Kingdom which (i) was incorporated in Great Britain on or after January 1st, 1963; (ii) commenced active shipping business on or after that date; or (iii) passed into the control of persons resident outside the United Kingdom on or after that date. In all such cases, the Board of Trade will wish to be satisfied that, in addition to meeting the standard requirements applying to all ships under the scheme, the transaction taken as a whole will not be detrimental to the balance of payments in the short-term.

Many transactions of this kind will in any event require Exchange Control consent (e.g. for permission to borrow abroad); in such cases, the Board will require applicants to seek Exchange Control consent before they are able to indicate whether or not an investment grant would be available. In cases which fall within this new procedure, but for which Exchange Control consent is not required for any part of the transaction, the Board of Trade will consider in con-

The Accountant Annual Awards for 1968

COMPANIES are reminded that they still have until January 31st to submit their reports and accounts presented at annual meetings held in 1967 for consideration for The Accountant Annual Awards to be made this year – the fifteenth year of the Awards.

Entries should be addressed to The Secretary, The Accountant Annual Awards, 151 Strand, London WC2. The only qualifying condition is that companies' shares are quoted on a recognized Stock Exchange in the United Kingdom.

The Awards were instituted in 1954 to encourage the preparation by public companies of clearer and more informative annual reports and accounts. Two Awards are made each year – one to large companies and the other to 'smaller' companies requiring less complex accounts than those of a large group.

sultation with the Treasury the effects of the transaction on the balance of payments. They will take into account the same factors as are normally considered in Exchange Control cases. If they consider that the transaction would be detrimental to the balance of payments in the short-term, no investment grant will be made in respect of the ship in question.

This new procedure will not be applied by the Board of Trade to any case where a firm contract for a new ship was placed before January 8th, 1968. If, however, a company which has placed such a contract requires and has not obtained Exchange Control consent, such consent must still be obtained in the ordinary way.

Resettlement Aid for Unemployed in Ireland

THE Minister for Labour in the Republic of Ireland has announced details of a State scheme to give financial assistance to unemployed workers so that they may move to employment in a new area.

The scheme will apply to workers over age 18 who are either unemployed or are under notice of redundancy and who are prepared to accept a new job beyond daily travelling distance from their homes. The workers must have been in employment insurable for benefits under the Social Welfare Acts, or in any other employment with pay not exceeding £1,200 per year. They must be registered at an unemployment exchange and be unable to obtain suitable jobs in their home area.

It will be necessary for the new jobs to hold reasonable expectations of permanency and be in areas where there are not enough suitable unemployed workers already.

Among the benefits available under the scheme will be free travel to the new area for the worker and his dependants; 80 per cent of the cost, up to £55 maximum, of moving furniture; a 'settling-in' allowance of £25; a contribution of £100 towards solicitors' and house agents' fees if the worker sells his home, and a grant of £3 per week towards lodging costs (up to a maximum of six months) for a worker who moves to a new area and leaves his dependants in their old home.

Government Debt Collecting Agency in Ulster

THIS year Northern Ireland may have the world's first Government-run debt collecting agency, which will have sweeping powers to extract payment from bad debtors. To be known as the Enforcement of Judgments Office, it is the subject of a Bill which the Minister of Home Affairs (Mr William Craig) will shortly put before Parliament in Belfast.

Features of the agency are that it will operate on a commission basis of about 1s in the f, and compile a public register of bad debtors. Its wide range of powers will include attachment of earnings, and the ability to summon debtors to Court for examination of their means.

The Government debt collecting agency is being

All seven are important, and possibly the most important thing about them is that they can only be found together in a building society.

ONLY BUILDING SOCIETIES GIVE YOU THE 'BIG SEVEN' BENEFITS

- 1 Interest on a range of savings schemes is equivalent to well over 7% for the standard rate taxpayer because . . .
- 2 ... income tax is paid by the Building Society.
- 3 Utmost security; the money goes into the most solid of all investments: owner-occupied property.
- 4 Freedom from market fluctuations.
- 5 Easy withdrawals at short notice.
- 6 No charges, no expenses.
- 7 Over-the-counter service: swift, efficient and friendly.

based on recommendations made by a group of experts appointed in 1963 by Mr Craig to modernize the law on debt collecting. Chairman of the joint working party was Mr Alfred Anderson, taxing master at the Law Courts, and the findings were published in an official report.

The report called for streamlining of some corners of the law which have not been altered since Magna Carta. If the Bill now being drafted becomes law, the present cumbersome and complicated machinery of debt collection will be replaced with a simple and efficient system.

Anybody who can prove in Court that another person owes him money, will only have to turn the matter over to the new office. His money will be extracted with all the power of the Government – for a 5 per cent commission.

The working party report recommends that the

Sickness Insurance for Housewives

N the past, insurers have steadfastly refused to insure the risk of women not gainfully employed being laid up due to sickness or accident. Now, however, the Permanent Insurance Co Ltd, drawing on more than eighty years of experience, has introduced a sickness policy specifically to cover housewives.

The aim is to allow husbands to insure against the cost of having to employ additional help to look after the house and children in case their wives should be laid up for a spell.

The insurance is being offered as a unit of £5 per week, payable after the first four weeks of incapacity. Built in to the policy are family income benefits of £260 a year in the event of the death of the wife.

Cover is arranged on a non-cancellable basis – so that a claim will continue to be paid so long as the wife remains incapacitated, or until the termination of the policy or her death. Policies can be arranged for terms of up to twenty years, but no cover will be given beyond the age of 55.

It is intended that the insurance shall be arranged by the husband in respect of his wife. The statutory relief of income tax can be claimed on the proportion of the premium relating to the family income benefit.

It is the current practice of the Inland Revenue not to charge tax on any benefit under the sickness section of the policy until it has been received continuously for a full fiscal year. Thereafter it will be treated for tax purposes as unearned income.

Who Owns Whom on the Continent?

ONCE again the continental edition of Who Owns Whom has increased in size and this useful and comprehensive directory now lists about 71,000 parent, associate and subsidiary companies, compared with about 63,000 in the previous edition. A new feature this year is the inclusion of Spain and Portugal for the first time.

The addresses of parent companies have been extended in the new directory, and the lists of subsidiary and associate companies have been checked with the parent companies thus enabling fuller information on subsidiaries and associates to be published. This information, of course, is often more recent than that published in company annual reports.

This is My Life

by An Industrious Accountant

FOLLOWING our recent unfortunate example of how a board meeting discussion can shoot off suddenly on an imbecile tangent, I fell to musing on the yardstick for a successful meeting. How should it be judged in retrospect? What are the criteria to be applied to the behaviour of directors at a formally convened conference? From the viewpoint of the professional man as a not insignificant cog in the wheel, how could I help them to progress satisfactorily?

I looked at some specimens of the typical agenda submitted to recent meetings as case-study material. They followed a fairly regular pattern and our directors' reactions have been predictable over the years. The problem was obviously to improve that reaction.

Scotty, the sales manager, usually sits in at board meetings when his particular responsibilities are under review, so I asked him his views on the subject. They were clear but not profound. 'The quicker they finish the better, laddie, if you ask me', he grinned. 'Give over the eternal talk, talk, talk, and come to a firm decision. That's how I like to do business.'

I gave him a pitying glance, which bounced off his hardened hide unnoticed, and got down to basic analysis. The items on the average agenda fell into readily identifiable categories, each requiring different treatment. A plan commenced to take nebulous shape. . . .

First, there are executive items merely requiring decision. Typical of these are the approval of the annual accounts, the appointment of a new director, or the passing of transfers of shares. These would already have been discussed and detailed reports circulated before we got together. They only require to be proposed and seconded without debate – say two minutes to be allowed for each item as a yardstick?

But somehow debate always erupts. The deputychairman will suddenly query the purchaser of a sizeable block of shares. 'Does anybody know this chap?' he'll ask. 'Is he involved with that take-over gang – that what's-its-name company – you must know them; they're always prowling around.' Everybody else gets into the act eagerly and an enjoyable ten minutes flies by.

How should one balance the value of the exchange of vague information against the valuable time spent?

The second category of items on the agenda is meant to be strictly informative. A good example is the profit and loss forecast for the forthcoming year which can only be based on intelligent 'guesstimates', and is designed to show broadly what the balance sheet at the coming year-end will probably look like, subject to regular up-dating. It serves as a background against which to review forward bank accommodation, dividend policy and selling campaigns, all featuring in separate detail further down the agenda.

Normally, a maximum of five minutes to assess the salient points should be sufficient.

It should be but, of course, it isn't. The chairman rarely misses the opportunity to denounce the tax provisions as outrageous. He doesn't try to understand the intricacies of the tax system. They rank with him in the same malevolent group as foot-and-mouth disease, driving him purple with frustrated indignation. His colleagues, becoming infected with his sentiments, probe the pernicious inequities of withholding tax or SET with disgruntled questions based on false assumptions.

I refer to the schedule of tax computations which I've carefully distributed to them all in advance and we then become entangled in the maze of investment grants and allowances.

When we emerge from this mêlée, Prinny is liable to query suspiciously why dividends are paid net, implying that we'd better watch out that we're not being tricked into paying twice – a comment usually followed by slanderous references to our friends in the Revenue. Twenty minutes slip by

I've learned from experience to arrange for the arrival of the afternoon tea-tray to coincide with this item, for tea-like music – hath power to soothe the savage breast. Meanwhile it's obvious that neither time nor logic are necessarily relevant to boardroom efficiency, so I must seek new yardsticks.

Cost-benefit Analysis

by R. F. J. DEWHURST, M.A., A.C.A.

AT one time the main function of an accountant was to record accurately transactions that had already taken place. The original basis was the yearly profit and loss account, but later this was split up into the smaller time elements of monthly management accounts, or even into the costs of a particular job or process. All recording work like this is purely historical.

The really useful job of an accountant surely must be to provide top management with information and advice relating to the future and which will be helpful in making decisions. Such a decision might be whether to spend more money on advertising and additional sales staff. Would the additional revenue justify this investment? Or should a new machine be purchased? Would the saving in labour costs justify the expenditure? Or is it sensible to set up a new factory? Would the increased profits make up for the heavy initial outflow of cash?

All these decisions consist essentially of comparing the money cost of the investment with the expected profits. Since the estimated increased profits will usually occur over several years, it is true that the time factor has to be taken into account. The benefits, however, are cash benefits and the basic comparison is between cash paid out initially on the investment, and the increased cash inflow from profits. Precise estimation may be difficult in practice. The theory is simple: cash out is being compared with cash in.

How, then, does the accountant advise when he has to consider expenditure on such matters as: research and development; canteen, social activities and amenities for employees; training facilities; donations; public gifts, trusts, research fellowships; public relations?

Expenditure on such activities is known; the benefits, however, are indirect and not readily assessable in terms of the hard cash received, for instance, from sales. Yet management has to decide whether to spend money on these items or to spend it on something with an immediate and calculable cash benefit, such as a new machine. Cash is seldom available in unlimited quantities; a choice has to be made and in order to exercise proper judgement in making that choice, some figure must be put on the cash value of these benefits.

Origin of cost-benefit analysis

Cost-benefit analysis – the procedure which enables these comparisons to be made – started in America in the 1930s in connection with large Federal schemes like the Tennessee Valley Authority. Why, it was argued, should the Tennessee Valley scheme be adopted rather than some different hydro-electric scheme? The investment cost of various schemes could be arrived at fairly accurately, but before any comparison could be made, it was necessary for the benefits in terms of reduced unemployment, the provision of electricity and water to the local population and to industry, the irrigation of farm land and so on, to be reduced to money terms.

Cost-benefit analysis is not yet widely used. In Britain, at any rate, it is still largely confined to Government departments and certain public authorities such as electricity boards, and is applied mainly by cost-minded economists. Broadly speaking, the initial approach is to split benefits into two groups:

(1) those whose value cannot be measured directly in any quantitative terms, e.g., spoliation of a view by a new power line;

(2) those which, though they cannot be measured directly in money terms, can be measured in some other unit (e.g., decrease in number of deaths due to an improved medical treatment; increase in years of schooling; increase in height or weight of children; or number of students who pass 'O' or 'A' level examinations).

It is now proposed to consider some methods of evaluation.

Historical approach

Decisions have, of course, been made in the past where benefits such as those outlined above have been set against their costs. But such decisions have invariably been personal or emotional in the sense that they have been made without figures to support them. Nevertheless, since the costs were usually known, they indicated what the corresponding benefits were regarded as being worth at that time. They provided, therefore, an historical basis for setting cost figures against them. Obviously if such figures are to be used as the basis for cost-benefit analysis today, the effect of inflation requires to be taken into account.

Direct approach

However, the problem of measuring cost benefits can be approached rather more scientifically. Take, for example, the calculation of the benefits from providing better travelling facilities by road between two towns. Since charges are not usually levied on all and sundry for travelling by road, the benefits cannot easily be measured directly. It is possible, however, to analyse the expected benefits. The potential users can be split broadly into two groups:

(a) commercial lorries and vehicles; and

(b) private cars;

(though of course there will be others, e.g., buses).

Traffic surveys will give an estimate of the numbers of each of these main types. If the proposed road shortens the distance between the two towns by (say) twenty miles, then each user will benefit to that extent from the saving in distance and time. The problem therefore resolves itself into transforming these figures into money terms. The commercial group will be comparatively easy. The main saving here is in distance; delivery costs can be assessed in terms of mileage. Some sort of average figure for a cost per mile, supplied perhaps by British Road Services, would provide a good basis.

Private cars, however, present a difficult problem. It is fairly easy to arrive at the saving in terms of petrol and depreciation, but the real gain is the social benefit in terms of leisure hours saved. Since private car mileage is the dominating factor, no real estimate of the overall benefits can be arrived at without putting some money figure on the benefit from a leisure hour. Can leisure hours be equated with office earning hours – on the basis that a man is prepared to contribute his time to his employer at an average rate of (say) £1 an hour. Surely this is not a fair comparison. The figure used by cost-benefit economists for pricing this sort of scheme is around 3s 6d an hour. How can this figure be arrived at? Another method of great importance considered below may provide the key.

Earlier it was said that charges are not usually levied on road-users. But the railways do charge – for both goods and passenger traffic – and road and rail are alternative possible means of travel. Now it is not suggested, of course, that the rail figures can be used directly and exclusively for the pricing of road benefits: other considerations need to be taken into account. Nevertheless a comparative quantitative basis has been established.

This is intended to illustrate the means by which apparently intractable cost-benefit problems may be tackled. In brief, find some yardstick (which can itself be costed) with which to compare the benefit in question. As a physical illustration of the method, assume it is desired to measure the height of an object. Suppose that for some reason it just is not possible to do this directly, i.e., by putting a measuring tape against it. It may, however, be compared with an object whose height is known to be a little under 10 ft, and perhaps with another object which is a little over. Obviously if it is higher than the first object and shorter than the second, its height must be around 10 ft. It has been measured, not directly but by comparison.

Negative benefits

In seeking to set a cash figure against 'benefits', the term must be understood to include also 'negative' benefits; for example, injury or death. It is not pleasant to contemplate the latter, yet it has to be faced up to. When a man is killed or maimed in a road accident, there are various scales which a judge will apply if the Court has to intervene in determining the amount of compensation which may be paid to the widow or the injured man. These amounts vary with the circumstances, i.e., wealth and income of the individual. Accordingly, since the average income may be established, an average value for death (or disablement) can be arrived at.

Again, however, the comparison must not be made without care. In this case the 'negative' benefit assessed is to a particular person—the spouse. The National Health Service has always had to face up indirectly to this problem when deciding how to allocate its money; indeed, quite directly when, for example, considering the provision of an additional kidney machine costing some £7,000.

Escalator problem

Suppose London Transport is considering the installation of a new escalator at a tube station, which will convey people up and down a good deal faster than of old. The benefit may be measured directly in quantitative terms, i.e., in passenger-hours saved. If the alternative investment is a new lift, then both benefits can be expressed in the same quantitative terms and comparison is possible.

When, however, the benefits are not expressed in the same units — for example, when the alternatives are faster tube trains, safer trains, more routes, better lighting on platforms, better ventilation, and so on — they must be changed into the same units of comparison. Cash is the obvious choice, for it has the especial advantage that the benefit in each case can be compared directly with its own cost.

Sub-optimal and optimal solutions

In a simple cost-benefit analysis such as the escalator problem above, the area within which the decision has to be made is fairly narrow. The cash will come from London Transport resources and comparison will only be made with other underground schemes which give benefits to the public. Such a restricted solution is called sub-optimal.

But all benefits provided by London Transport are paid for by the public, and other public utilities such as the buses, B.R. trains, etc., afford similar benefits. An optimal solution would require that the costs and benefits be compared – not only within the underground system but across the whole range of public transport facilities.

Ideally, all public money benefits should be compared and schemes should only be adopted if they give value for money when related to all Civil Service, local government, etc., expenditure.

Time and the 8 per cent rate

Time is an important factor in most cost-benefit analyses. Generally speaking, costs have to be met initially in the form of a large capital investment sum; benefits come later. The buildings of a staff training college have to be paid for at the outset – the rewards, in terms of trained personnel, capable of doing better work and earning higher salaries, will be spread over many years.

When public money is being employed, the rate the Government has to pay for long-term (undated) debt would seem to provide a good basis for establishing a discount rate. Strictly, therefore, present value analysis should be used and this rate applied to discount future 'shadow' prices or benefits.

There is, however, another figure that may be taken. Early in the 1960s, targets were set for the return on net assets for the nationalized industries. Electricity was the highest at 12.4 per cent (before depreciation), British European Airways was 6 per cent; the railways were supposed to break even, and so on. Recently, however, some cost-minded economists have argued on these lines: 'All the funds come from the same source – the Exchequer – and all are spent on the public. So why should different rates of return be required?'

The Post Office rate was the first to be set at the new 8 per cent target figure, and for many reasons this seems to be an appropriate overall rate. It ties up pretty well with the average after-tax figure achieved by private industry, and since the nationalized industries do not normally have to pay tax, in practice the comparison is fair.

Standardization on this quasi magical 8 per cent figure (or some very similar figure¹) seems almost certain in future. Why should it not be applied throughout the world? Is there any justification for money earning 8 per cent in Britain but only (perhaps) 5 per cent in Peru? And why 8 per cent anyway? Is it a good measure of business efficiency — a guide to technocratic achievement?

Scope

Any statement of the areas which provide scope for the use of cost-benefit analysis must look rather like a comprehensive list of Government and quasi-Government institutions; in particular:

(1) the Ministries of Health, Education and Science, Technology, Overseas Development, etc.;

(2) the Armed Forces ('cost-effectiveness' would be the better term here);

- (3) water boards, harbour boards, C.E.G.B., B.B.C., B.O.A.C., B.E.A., M.M.B. (and similar product and livestock boards). The Arts Council, museums, libraries, art galleries. (Incidentally, why spend £100,000 more on The National History Museum rather than the Science Museum, and in any case why spend it on museums rather than on art galleries or libraries?);
- (4) universities, technical colleges, training schools;

(5) research establishments etc.

Conclusion

This article may be summarized as saying that:

- (a) apart from his recording work, the job of an accountant in a business is to advise and to assist in making financial decisions;
- (b) such decisions involve weighing a payment now against its anticipated cash inflow later (sometimes the payments are 'negative', as in a cost-cutting exercise);
- (c) some decisions of business accountants e.g., for expenditure on research, advertising, publicity, personnel, welfare and public relations and nearly all decisions of administrative officers in nationalized industries and Government departments, are difficult to evaluate on this basis. One side of the 'equation' the estimated expenditure or investment is comparatively easy to determine in money terms; the other side the expected benefits can usually only be expressed (if at all) in non-cash quantitative units, such as leisure hours.
- (d) when the benefit from alternative investments can be expressed in the same quantitative units (as in the lift and escalator problem), a direct comparison is possible. But whether investment in either is justified is still not proven;
- (e) when the benefits from the alternative investments are not in the same quantitative units, they must be converted to a common unit. Cash has the overwhelming advantage that it enables the benefit from the investment to be compared directly with the cost, and hence to determine whether the expenditure is justified;
- (f) converting benefits into cash terms is difficult; techniques do, however, exist, and progress becomes easier as we proceed into this almost uncharted area. When one or two agreed figures (such as a leisure-hour rate) have been established as landmarks, other figures can be related to these;
- (g) conversion of benefits into money terms is not the final step; the time element must be taken into account. That discount rate which, when applied to the benefits, will make them equal to the investment amount, must be determined. This return on investment rate is the best measure for comparison purposes and the more widely this analysis is applied, the more apparent it becomes that some sort of standard return on money invested is required. This article argues for an 8 per cent rate.

The role of the accountant in this type of work is particularly important. Many of the problems he already has had to face up to directly. He is trained to evaluate costs and to understand their meaning. Why should not multi-million pound investment decisions be made by cost-minded accountants rather than cost-minded economists?

The return on education in Great Britain is about 9 per cent. The National Economic Development Council pamphlet on Investment Appraisal advises that 7 to 9 per cent should be regarded as a fair rate for judging new investment proposals.

Policies for School Fees

by AN INSURANCE CORRESPONDENT

ARECENT survey found that only 4 per cent of the parents with two or more children at school together manage to pay for their fees out of current income. The rest have to make other arrangements.

There a number of different ways in which school fees (or at least the bulk of them) can be met other than by paying for them, as they fall due, from net income. Since most of these arrangements are tied in one way or another to life assurance, appreciable savings in cost can be achieved in view of the relief of income tax allowed on life assurance premiums. For, apart from the element of the premium devoted to the life risk, it is the premiums which build up the capital sum to pay the fees.

The saving in cost is particularly marked when all or a substantial part of the costs are met before the first fees become payable. Nevertheless, even when the bulk of the cost is paid after a child has gone to school (in which case it is necessary to borrow the fees from a bank, insurance company or elsewhere), there can be savings in costs for those in the surtax brackets.

Endowment life policies

Of the methods for meeting the bulk of the cost in advance, one of the most popular has been the endowment life policy which is arranged to mature at the time when the child first goes to school. Instead of a lump sum being paid, generally the benefits from a policy of this type are paid either annually or three times a year (so as to coincide with the school terms) for a period of, say, five years.

Clearly, so as to spread the cost of this arrangement over a reasonably long period, the policy should be arranged as early as possible in the child's life. Unfortunately, however, this does not always prove possible in practice. Many young parents cannot afford the premiums and defer making plans until a later stage. A few years later this is unlikely to be the best arrangement since the premiums will be concentrated into a relatively short period. Not only may they be too high, but the full two-fifths relief of income tax probably cannot be claimed on the whole of them since almost certainly they will exceed £7 per cent of the sum assured.

Generally, when arrangements can be made only a comparatively few years before a child will go to school, the best plan is for the cost to the parent to be spread over the period between the date when the policy is effected and the time when the child leaves school.

In this case, an endowment policy is effected to mature when the child leaves school. As the fees become due they are met by borrowing from the insurance office against the surrender value of the policy. Clearly, as the premiums continue to be paid, the surrender value of the policy builds up so that loans can continue to be made against it. Finally, the policy matures and the loans are repaid in full.

Should the parent die at any time while the policy is in force, the full sum assured (plus any bonuses earned to date in the case of a with-profit policy) will be paid. Thus the school fees are secure.

If the estimated maturity value of a with-profit policy is taken into account when calculating the sum required to meet the fees over the period, it is usual for this to be linked to some form of term assurance or family income benefit policy. In the event of the parent's death, this will make good the deficiency caused by the fact that only the bonuses actually earned before death will be paid by the policy.

There is no doubt that arrangements on this basis can be suitable for a great many parents. And, since the bonuses are likely to be greater than the figure used in the initial calculations, when the policy matures not only will the loans be paid off in full but in addition there will be a tax-free capital sum.

Nevertheless, for this method to operate, the premiums must be paid a few years before the fees are required – so that a surrender value can build up in time for the first loan for fees to be made against it. For one reason or another, there are a great many parents who do not plan ahead even to this extent. Perhaps they hope that, when the time comes, they will be able to meet the fees from income. But they find this impossible and suddenly need to borrow all, or part, of the fees.

Personal Ioan scheme

Fortunately, in a great many cases even these needs can be met. One of the clearing banks is now providing personal loans for the specific purpose of school fees (for both preparatory schools and public schools). The main stipulation is that the parent must be earning at least £2,500 a year and, at the moment, the lending is restricted to men in professions and occupations approved by the bank.

The principle behind these 'instant' school fees is quite simple. At the outset an overall borrowing limit is agreed (although it is quite possible that this may be raised at a later date if there is an increase in the school fees). Fees may be borrowed up to this limit as they are required. No parent is obliged to borrow up to the Mimit, and repayments can be made at any time. This flexibility can be a great help in keeping down the costs.

The interest charged on these loans is calculated on a day-to-day basis, at 12 per cent above Bank rate, subject to a minimum of 6 per cent.

Generally, the sum total of the loans is repayable fifteen years after the initial arrangements were made, although in some cases the period is reduced to ten years. The method of repayment is by means of a nonprofit endowment life assurance policy which is arranged at the outset. Incidentally, if the borrowing limit is increased because of a rise in the school fees, additional life assurance is available without further evidence of health being required.

Built into the life policy is a waiver of both premiums and all interest due under the arrangement in the event of the parent being laid up for a long period due to accident or sickness. Thus this waiver comes into operation only after the first thirteen weeks of incapacity.

This scheme has a considerable amount of flexibility, although it is limited to basic fees and does not cover the cost of 'extras', such as uniforms or special fees, and has the advantage that, since it is clearing bank money which is being used, it is cheaper than some of the earlier schemes which were introduced to provide 'instant' school fees. The bank insists that the parent must maintain an account with it, but although no doubt this is designed to attract additional customers. it does not mean that a parent is obliged to change his allegiance from his present bank. There is, of course, nothing to prevent anyone from having accounts with two different banks, and there is a good deal to be said in favour of this course when loan facilities will be required.

Realizing capital

Despite the relatively low rate of interest (compared with many other forms of borrowing), this can, of course, be quite expensive. As a result, for some parents it may be advisable for them to realize capital (which, almost certainly, will be yielding less than the rate of interest required for a loan).

As an example, one can assume that a parent is faced with the prospect, at some time, of paying school fees of £600 a year for five years. The cash cost is £3,000. If, however, a capital payment is made at birth, say, thirteen years before the child's entry to school, those fees will be secured by a single payment of £1,807 10s. If the payment is made ten years in advance, £2,029 17s 6d will be required. At five years before entry the figure is £2,429 17s 6d. And even if the payment is not made until the child actually enters the school, there is still a saving of £156.

What must, of course, be pointed out to parents is that these advance payments simply secure a set sum (in this case £600 a year for five years). They do not automatically secure the fees which will be payable. Thus, it is as well to calculate on the basis that the fees quoted by the school will rise appreciably before the child goes to school. Unless this is taken into account, a further payment will have to be made, or the parent will have to face the additional cost from income.

Fees paid by grandparents

Deeds of covenant made by grandparents are not generally so popular as they used to be since, as there is no surtax relief on fresh deeds, in practice they are more expensive for the grandparent.

There is, however, no reason why a grandparent should not make a capital payment towards school fees. In this case there is the great advantage that, whereas a covenant ceases at death, the school fees are secure when a capital payment has been made. Furthermore, according to the present practice of the estate duty office, duty is payable on the capital sum at the settlor's death only so long as he retains the option to recover this payment at will. Provided, therefore, he is prepared to forgo his right to ask for the surrender of the payment (which should be considered reasonable enough in the circumstances), the payment is segregated from the estate and, irrespective of when death may occur, duty will not be payable on it.

The mechanics of the whole arrangement are that the capital sum is paid to the trustees of a scheme who simply invest the money with an insurance company which by means of an annuity guarantees the required fees at the right time. This procedure has no effect on the income tax position of either the parent or the child, since the payments are considered to be income of the school to which the child goes. There is, however, a 'saving clause' in the trust deed, to the effect that if there should be a change in the present law whereby charitable institutions are exempt from income tax on their income, the settlor may be required to pay the difference between the amount shown on the schedule to the trust deed and the actual amount received under the annuity policy if the latter should be lower. There is, however, no reason whatsoever to expect that this clause might be invoked.

Practical as this arrangement may be in theory, in practice there is often the problem that a grandparent feels that all the grandchildren must be treated in the same way - but that he could not afford the loss of income which this would entail in view of the reduction in his capital which would be involved. Depending on the age of the grandparent, there may well be a way round this particular difficulty. This, however, will have the effect of reducing the capital still further which usually simply means that there will be less for the beneficiaries (who are likely to be the parents of the children being educated) when the settlor dies.

Briefly, so as to maintain net income despite the drop in capital due to the capital payments for school fees, further capital is realized (over and above that needed for the school fee payments), and this is used to purchase an immediate annuity, probably on the joint lives of the grandparent and his wife. In this way their income is assured for life, although there will be no provision for it to rise to keep pace with the increasing cost of living.

Premiums paid by employer

Where parents of children approaching school age cannot afford any of these means to provide school fees, and are not fortunate enough to have parents who can help in one way or another, often an employer will come to the rescue — although few employers will do more than contribute towards part of the costs involved.

Sometimes an employer will pay half the premium of a life policy used to provide school fees. In this case, the employer's contribution is considered by the Inland Revenue to be an increase in salary, and thus is taxable. Nevertheless, the employee is, of course, entitled to income tax relief at the statutory rate on the full premium. Usually, when this method is adopted, the policy is assigned to the employer. In due course it is the employer who receives the benefits from the insurance company. The employee is then reimbursed by the employer on production of the accounts from the school.

Considerable savings can accrue to an employee if loans can be made by the employer so that a capital payment in advance can secure the fees. Sometimes a suitable fund already exists. In other cases, employers are prepared to institute one. Since only loans are made, in due course the money becomes available for another employee. In this way, the scheme can become self-supporting, with no further contributions being required from the employer.

When this arrangement is adopted, the employee effects an endowment life assurance policy on his own life, on which he pays the premium. It is then assigned to the employer.

This is a suitable case for arranging the policy on a with-profit basis so that not only at maturity should there be a sum sufficient to repay the capital loan, but in addition there should be a tax-free lump sum for the employee. Nevertheless, where a with-profit policy is arranged, it should have attached to it a decreasing assurance benefit of sufficient amount so that, in the event of the employee's death, it will replace any profits remaining to be earned in order to repay the loan in full to the employer. Incidentally, this additional benefit also ensures that the employee obtains full income tax relief on the premiums for the shorter-term policies.

This particular scheme is extemely flexible. For instance, it can be used for the employee whose child has just been born, or for someone whose child is due to go to his public school in the very near future (or is even at school already).

Taxation Cases

(Before Mr Justice PENNYCUICK)

Income tax – Acquisition of legal estate – Equitable interest in other persons – Conveyances by taxpayer – Consideration to other persons – Whether property-dealing – Income Tax Act 1952, Schedule D, Case I.

In October 1955, a property known as Oxford Mills at Ashton-under-Lyne was purchased by three men (the three) by auction from a company (Masons) for £59,000. The plant and machinery was immediately re-sold by the three for £56,490, and they did not then wish to complete the conveyance of the freehold. One of the three, Hatton, and the taxpayer were well known to one another, but they had not been associated in any business transactions. It was arranged by the three with the taxpayer that the latter should pay £7,000 to each of two of the three (not Hatton), and should discharge the auctioneers' account of £2,510 19s 5d and an account of £81 17s for repairs; and that the taxpayer should adopt the uncompleted contract and have the property conveyed to him for nothing. There was already a contract for the sale of part of the property to Hogg & Mitchell Ltd for £18,000.

The property was conveyed by Masons direct to the taxpayer on July 19th, 1956, and he hoped to let the rest of the property and have the rent as income when he retired. The conveyance to Hogg & Mitchell Ltd was completed on July 20th, 1956. The taxpayer conveyed another part of the property to Spring Grove Laundries Ltd in March 1959, after negotiations for letting as a garage had broken down.

The conveyance of July 19th, 1956, was for £5,210, and was of the whole of the property including the part already agreed to be sold to Hogg & Mitchell Ltd. The conveyance was endorsed with a memorandum of the conveyance to Hogg & Mitchell Ltd, one of the conveyance to Spring Grove Laundries Ltd, and another of a deed of exchange dated January 27th, 1960, with Spring Grove. There was no evidence that the £7,000, £7,000, £2,510 198 5d and £81 178 had passed through the hands of the taxpayer. The £18,000 was sufficient to cover those sums.

Assessments under Case I of Schedule D were made on the taxpayer for 1956-57 and 1959-60 on the footing that he had carried on a trade as a property-dealer. The assessments were in the sums of £13,684 and £12,636 respectively, and were calculated by treating the taxpayer as having purchased the entire freehold for £16,818, and as having sold the part to Hogg & Mitchell Ltd in July 1956, and the further part to Spring Grove Laundries Ltd in March 1959. There was no assessment relating to the exchange with the latter company in January 1960.

Held: (1) the taxpayer never took the equitable interest in the part sold to Hogg & Mitchell Ltd, nor in the remainder of the property, because the three did not join in the conveyance to him; (2) the taxpayer held only the legal estate in the property, and his part in the transaction did not amount to trading.

Salmon v. Havering Commissioners

(Before Mr Justice Pennycuick)

Income tax – Penalty – Negligence – Whether certificate of interest refused – Whether negligence proved – Whether penalty excessive – Reconsideration of income in penalty proceedings – Finance Act 1960, sections 47, 48, 54, 58, 60, 63.

The taxpayer traded as a general dealer. Additional assessments were made on him for 1953-54 to 1958-59, and a first assessment for 1959-60. After an hearing on appeal to the Special Commissioners the assessments were confirmed in amounts greater than those in his returns. The taxpayer did not appeal against this decision.

The Inland Revenue then instituted proceedings for penalties based primarily on the allegation that the tax-payer had in his returns understated the profits of his trade. These proceedings came on before the General Commissioners for the Havering Division of Essex. Evidence was given by the Inspector of Taxes. No evidence was given on behalf of the taxpayer, but submissions were made on his behalf. The General Commissioners negatived any intention to deceive the Inland Revenue, and therefore found him not guilty of fraud; but they found him guilty of negligence. They awarded a penalty in respect of each year of £50 plus half the difference between the amount of tax based on the return and the amount based on the assessment.

It was contended for the taxpayer in the High Court (1) that as the Special Commissioners had not given a certificate of interest under section 58 of the Finance Act 1960, they had to be treated as having made a finding of no negligence; (2) that the taxpayer was not liable to a penalty for 1959-60 because there was only the first assessment for that year; (3) that negligence had not been proved for any year; (4) that the amount of the penalty was excessive. It was accepted on behalf of the Revenue that the amount of income charged by an assessment could be reconsidered in connection with an application for a penalty.

Held: (1) an implication of no negligence could not be made merely because the Special Commissioners had not given a certificate for interest; (2) the fact that no additional assessment had to be made for a particular year did not prevent a penalty being imposed for that year; (3) the General Commissioners' finding of negligence was not contrary to the weight of evidence; (4) the amount of the penalty was not unreasonable, and the General Commissioners' decision thereon could not be displaced.

Carlisle Butchers Ltd v. Minister of Labour

In the High Court of Justice (Queen's Bench Division) – December 1st, 1967

Selective employment tax — Slaughterhouse — Company consortium of butchers — Employees of company — Meat property of butchers — Whether distributive trade — Whether meatpreserving — Whether wholesale slaughtering — Standard Industrial Classification, minimum list headings 214, 810 (2).

The company was founded by a consortium of butchers and they held 75 per cent of the shares. The company operated a slaughterhouse and those working there were employees of the company, but the live and dead meat remained the property of the butchers. After an animal was killed, the carcass was washed and trimmed, and put into a cooling room.

It was contended for the company that the activity carried on in the slaughterhouse consisted of 'otherwise preserving meat' within minimum list heading 214. It was contended for the Minister of Labour that the activity was under heading 810 (2) in that it was the activity of a distributive trade, and was 'wholesale slaughtering'. The Industrial Tribunal decided in favour of the Minister.

Held: the Industrial Tribunal's decision was correct.

Lord Advocate (for Minister of Labour) v. Reliant Tool Co

(Before Viscount DILHORNE, Lord MACDERMOTT, Lord GUEST, Lord WILBERFORCE and Lord PEARSON)

Selective employment tax — Refund — Premium — Designing machines and tools — Whether manufacturing metal-working tools — Whether professional or scientific services — Whether minimum list headings mutually exclusive — Selective Employment Payments Act 1966, sections 1, 2, 10 — Minimum list headings 332, 349, 879.

The respondents' business consisted basically of designing machine tools, although tools could also be made if required. The designs were produced on a contract basis for manufacturing businesses, and the respondents did not deal with the public. The tools could not be made without being designed, and the designing was a necessary stage in their manufacture. Drawings and specifications of the finished product were usually drawn up by the respondents' customers and handed over to the respondents before the latters' designing began.

The Industrial Tribunal decided that the respondents were entitled to selective employment premium.

The Minister of Labour appealed on the grounds that the respondents' activities were not those of manufacturing, and that the activities fell under heading 879. It was contended for the respondents that their activities were those of the manufacturing of products within heading 332, and not the rendering of professional or scientific services within heading 879.

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Session): as the designing was a necessary stage in the manufacture of the machine tools in question it was a part of the process of manufacture within heading 332; and that the respondents were entitled to the premium.

The Changing Pattern of Internal Auditing

The Management Audit

by F. J. RIGG, F.C.A.
Group Internal Auditor, Taylor Woodrow Group

THE word 'audit' derives from the Latin audeo - 'I hear' - and in earlier days an auditor was one who listened to an account of somebody's stewardship. In fact, I suppose one of the earliest accounts of an audit can be found in the Bible story of the landowner who called his steward to give an account of his handling of the master's affairs (Luke, Chapter 16). Incidentally, the same story relates what must be the earliest recorded case of falsification of accounting documents to benefit the dishonest employee.

In more recent times, however, the auditor became more commonly a person who gave his attention to the written record. He sat himself in front of a mountain of documents and ledgers and spent his days checking one against the other, using pens and pencils and rubber stamps of many colours, plus an excellent head for casting columns of figures. The image of the accountant and auditor today seems to have become stuck at this point. On the first day of the Ninth International Congress of Accountants recently held in Paris, Le Figaro carried a cartoon showing three old men standing on the podium with the caption, 'Now then, gentlemen, all together, let us recite the nine times table.'

Of course, we cannot, nor should we want to escape from the necessity to check documentary records in the course of our work. I still count as the tools of my trade coloured pencils and rubber stamps, but I think you will understand best the widening of the horizons of the auditor when I tell you that a safety helmet is an equally important tool of my trade as an internal auditor in the construction industry.

The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales has recognized this and included a picture of a 'new style' chartered accountant wearing a safety helmet in a recent advertising campaign. But therein lies the distinction with which we are most concerned here. The advertisement showed a helmet with the word 'Visitor' on it – mine has the Taylor Woodrow 'Teamwork' symbol on it. I am an internal auditor – that is to say, I am employed directly on the staff of the group of companies which I and my staff audit. With these widened horizons I am getting back closer to the original auditor because I am as much concerned in going round hearing what people have to say – and using my eyes to see what is going on – as I am in checking figures on pieces of paper.

A paper presented at a recent two-day course on internal auditing held at Slough College in conjunction with the London Chapter of The Institute of Internal Auditors.

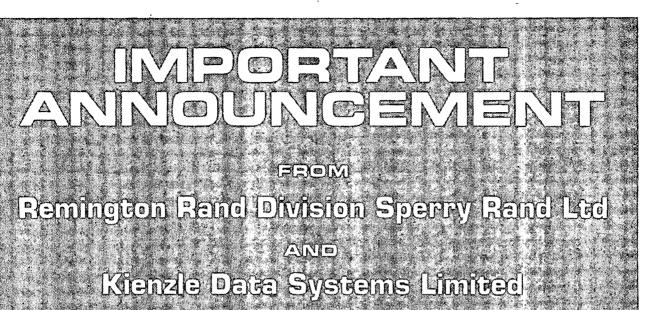

The development of Internal auditing

A person carrying on business entirely on his own doesn't need any kind of audit, but as soon as he takes on an assistant he must begin to exercise control over someone other than himself. As the business expands the owner must delegate increasing amounts of what were his own responsibilities and so must begin to build into the business systems of internal check. He must also ensure that his accounting system will provide him with the information he needs to be able to direct the business from the top. In the early days of this expansion it will not be economic for him to employ someone solely for his business to advise him on the adequacy of the system of internal check and he will employ outside accountants for this purpose. The time will eventually come, however, when it is advantageous to employ his own internal auditor to assist in this aspect of running the business.

Over the later part of the last century and the early part of the twentieth century, the concept of the joint-stock company grew and developed. This brought with it the necessity for the independent external auditor whose task was, and still is, to report to the owners of the business – the shareholders – as to the correctness of the accounts presented to them by the managers. This necessity has long since been embodied in statute law and the external auditor, in order to carry out his statutory responsibility, must concern himself with the theoretical systems of internal control in a business.

Because of the practical impossibility of checking every transaction, he must carry out tests, or samples, to see to what extent those control systems are operating satisfactorily. On the results of these tests he will base his assessment of the accuracy of the accounts presented for audit. However, as businesses became bigger and more complex, managements came to realize that in addition to installing internal control systems, it was necessary to have the operation of these systems checked. This checking was needed at more frequent intervals than the external auditors were able to do or even considered necessary. From this developed the close liaison which now exists in many companies between external and internal auditors.

The increasing quantity of checking that external auditors found necessary was often the origin of the creation of internal audit departments. Just as often as some companies felt the need for their own internal auditors, created a department, and persuaded the external auditors to accept some of the work done as contributing to their

From January 1st, 1968 marketing and servicing of the "ARISTOCRAT" range of accounting machines has passed from the Remington Rand Division Sperry Rand Limited to a new United Kingdom company called Kienzle Data Systems Limited.

This new company is a subsidiary of the West German manufacturers of the equipment, Kienzle Apparate GmbH. and, with the assistance and approval of Remington Rand, has taken over the experienced Remington staff previously employed on marketing and servicing the equipment. Kienzle Data Systems Limited is thus able to effect complete continuity in marketing and servicing of Kienzle machines.

For the first few months the new company will operate from Remington Rand premises in London, Birmingham, Manchester, Leeds and Glasgow, until its new offices are ready.

It will retain the ex-Remington Rand managers, but will be strengthened by a small group of highly experienced specialists from the parent company.

Remington Rand and Kienzle Data Systems Limited believe that this new arrangement will benefit existing and future users of this important range of Accounting Machines and Accounting Computers.

PLANNED PROJECTS FOR INDUSTRY LIMITED Vale House, Clarence Road, Tunbridge Wells, Kent. Telephone Tunbridge Wells 28166 (5 lines) task, so external auditors persuaded other companies to create or strengthen internal audit departments as a necessary feature of the internal control systems required. In either case it became very much a feature of internal auditing that the load was spread between them.

The Statements on Auditing issued by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales include under section U4 of the Member's Handbook a chapter on Internal Control which says, amongst other things:

'Where an internal audit is carried out it is for the independent auditors to decide whether, and to what extent, consistently with their statutory responsibilities, they can rely on the work of the internal auditors in order to reduce the extent of their own examination of detail.'

The whole question of the relationship between internal and external auditors is dealt with in more detail in an appendix. In many companies, therefore, internal auditing was begun to undertake a part of the routine checking previously done by the external auditors. Amongst other benefits was the fact that, because certain work was being checked continuously, the external auditors could have more confidence in the overall efficiency of internal control and probably speed up the certification of the year-end accounts.

Incidentally, in line with the fairly general attitude of many managements towards auditors, especially those oriented towards production or sales — i.e. that they were a necessary evil or at most a nuisance—it was not uncommon, where the initiative for creating the internal audit department had come from outside, to regard that department as a very useful place for dumping misfits — people of little ability whose length of service precluded dismissal. After all, the work done was of little value to management and should, therefore, be carried out by the least valuable employees at minimum cost.

More enlightened managements, however, gave their internal audit departments certain very important responsibilities:

the prevention and detection of theft and fraud;

the prevention and detection of error;

the detection and reporting of non-compliance with financial regulations and accounting instructions.

To carry out these responsibilities it became common practice to assign staff to such tasks as verifying cash balances, receivables, stocks and fixed assets. They were required to review systems of internal control and test their effectiveness — as the external auditors do — but more continuously.

Gradually, however, developments took place under pressure both from managements — looking for assistance in their ever more complicated tasks — and from internal auditors concerned with making their work more useful in a positive way. As we shall see later, these developments have now, in many companies, progressed to the point that internal auditing is a very positive tool of management. In these companies it is no longer merely a necessary evil, adding to overheads, but rather a service contributing positively, and even quite often in a financially measurable way, to the overall health and profitability of an enterprise.

The Institute of Internal Auditors

Arising from these developments, as long ago as 1941, a group of internal auditors in the United States decided together to form their own Institute to develop the true professional status for internal auditing and to provide a medium for the interchange of ideas and information among those engaged in its practice. The objectives of the Institute (which, not unnaturally, was given the name, 'The Institute of Internal Auditors') were and still are:

Educational – To create, disseminate and promote an interest in information concerning internal auditing and related subjects.

Ethical - To establish and maintain high standards of professional conduct.

Social - To promote contact and the exchange of information among members.

One of the most significant actions of the Institute has been the periodic publication of a statement setting out what internal auditing aims to be. The developments which gave rise to the creation of the Institute have gone on over the years and an examination of the various statements issued will illustrate these changes. The first statement, issued in 1947, was called 'Statement of the Responsibilities of the Internal Auditor'. In discussing the nature of internal auditing at that time it stated that:

'Internal auditing is the independent appraisal activity within an organization for the review of the accounting, financial, and other operations, as a basis for protective and constructive service to management. It is a type of control which functions by measuring and evaluating the effectiveness of other types of control. It deals primarily with accounting and financial matters but it may also properly deal with matters of an operating nature.'

Ten years later in May 1957, on account of the continuing development of the profession, the Institute issued a revised statement expressing a broader concept. Under the heading of 'Objective and Scope of Internal Auditing' the statement says:

'The overall objective of internal auditing is to assist all members of management in the effective discharge of their responsibilities by furnishing them with objective analysis, appraisals, recommendations and pertinent comments concerning the activities reviewed. The internal auditor, therefore, should be concerned with any phase of business activity wherein he can be of service to management. The attainment of this overall objective of service to management should involve such activities as:

reviewing and appraising the soundness, adequacy and application of accounting, financial and operational controls; ascertaining the extent of compliance with established policies, plans and procedures; ascertaining the extent to which company assets are accounted for, and safeguarded from losses of all kinds:

ascertaining the reliability of accounting and other data developed within the organization; and finally, appraising the quality of performance in carrying out assigned responsibilities.'

This year the statement has come under review again and a revision has recently been circulated to members for their consideration. It should be noted that the motto of the Institute is 'Progress through sharing' and this is admirably demonstrated by the fact that all members are being asked to say whether they feel the latest statement expresses what they feel their function to be. In fact, this latest revision is entitled 'Statement of the Function of Internal Auditing'. It states boldly at the beginning under 'Nature of Internal Auditing':

'Internal auditing is a part of the control function of management.'

It goes on to say that the review and appraisal is to be of the adequacy as well as of the effectiveness of the controls used by management in conducting the organizations' activities. Under 'Objective and Scope', the five items mentioned previously are reduced to four by combining the second and fifth, particularly to make it clear that the internal auditor does not have a responsibility to appraise the quality of technical performance but rather appraises the quality of managerial control over performance.

In practice, the functions of the internal auditor will be governed by the attitude of the top management towards the purposes and objects of internal audit. For this reason the 'Authority and Responsibility' section of the 1957 statement is revised to read:

'Responsibility and Authority. — The responsibility for internal auditing coverage in the organization should be clearly established by management policy. The related authority should provide the internal auditor full access to all the organization's records, properties and personnel relevant to the subject under review.'

Under 'Independence' it is made clear that whilst it is undesirable for internal auditors to become involved in installing procedures, preparing records and so on, circumstances may demand that occasionally they may, by virtue of their knowledge and experience, be called upon to do so, by management.

Development of management auditing

What, then, have we to learn from this study of developments as reflected by the official position of the Institute? Quite clearly we have got a long way beyond the routine of ticking and vouching. We are part of the management team, giving a service which only 'independent appraisal' can give. It is interesting to note that ten years ago, in 1957, at the Seventh International Congress of Accountants held in Amsterdam, one of the major subjects on which five very good papers were presented for discussion was this very subject of internal auditing. Reading these papers in the published proceedings of the congress, however, it is clear that since then much development has taken place. The change which has come about most strikingly is the development of the 'management aid' aspect.

A definition I have seen - not by the Institute - reads:

'A critical appraisal and review of the executive process in action, covering the extent and effectiveness of the system of delegation channels of communication, harmony of co-ordination, the adequacy of the methods of planning and control, the skill in supplying management data as a guide to executive action, and in general the competence of supervisory and specialist teams'.

As one can see, that is quite a lot of ground to cover, and requires a lot of skill. The important thing to remember, however, is that this is a service to management. The auditor must bear in mind that he is not the manager. He must be independent and free of executive responsibility.

On the other hand, to do his job effectively he must 'think management', or as last year's International Presidents of the Institute put it in his theme for the year – 'Demonstrate management perspective'. This approach can best be illustrated by quoting a senior executive who, addressing a meeting of the audit staff, said:

'I want you to assume that you are the owner of the business, that the business and all of its profits belong to you. Before you recommend a change, before you criticize an operation, ask yourself whether you would do this if the business was yours.'

As an illustration of the approach needed, it has been said that the external auditor's job is sedentary, whilst that of the internal auditor is 'ambulatory' – that is to say, he has to get up off his chair and go out to find out what makes the organization 'tick'.

I once heard a story about an auditor who, when visiting a depot of his company, noticed in the yard a van which was not in the pristine condition the company prided itself in keeping its vehicles. In fact, it did not bear the company's name at all. He asked casually in the office 'Whose van is that out in the yard?' The clerk replied that he thought it was 'Something to do with the manager'. Further inquiries showed that it was a vehicle on hire. Now this was very curious, because the registration number was similar to others he had seen at head office.

On going into the matter further the internal auditor found that it was the practice to sell all company vehicles when they were three years old in order to maintain a high standard of appearance. More interesting, however, was that it was also usual to offer such vehicles first to staff members at special prices. In this case the depot manager had purchased the vehicle for about £300, given it to his girl friend and then, as depot manager, hired it back from her. During the time this vehicle was on hire they had collected about £700.

Now an auditor who sat back at his desk and spent his time going carefully through the books would never have found out about this little 'arrangement' (perhaps 'fraud' would be too harsh a term). Even more important, the story illustrates how an auditor can contribute to profitability. In this case it was apparently possible for the depot manager to hire vehicles for a long term without authority or at least without adequate control. It is likely that hiring in this way, apart from the personal profit angle, the manager was able to get round whatever control there may have been on capital expenditure. For the intelligent commercially-minded auditor the story doesn't finish with the fraud.

Now, to be more specific, what are the sort of matters which will come under review and appraisal in a management audit?

First – we cannot ever really get away from the age-old function of auditing. It is inevitable that when anyone carries out anything which has the word 'audit' in its name most people will assume that at the end of it, whatever else he may or may not have done, he has at least satisfied himself that the books are correct. In a way I think that it is a pity that we have to use the word 'audit'. In fact, the Institute of Internal Auditors has been discussing for a long time the possibility of a change of name more accurately to reflect the modern function. Unfortunately we have so far been unsuccessful.

So first of all our work has its beginning where it all began – in the books. Are the transactions of the company accurately and promptly recorded in the accounting

- records? This involves an examination of the systems in operation for the processing of accounting documentation, to see whether they are such as to ensure that the resultant figures will be correct. In this context, 'correct' means accurate to the extent that the particular figures need to be in relation to their importance. It is also necessary to see that the controls in operation cover the prevention of fraud—this goes without saying. The auditor must therefore find out:
 - (a) What system is established?
 - (b) Is that system operating as laid down? and
 - (c) Is the system the best to achieve the purpose for which it was designed?

In order to do this he must be well versed in systems, both from an efficiency point of view and in the sense of control theory. In other words, he has to be capable of being a more clever crook than the crook. The management auditor must then concern himself with what these 'correct' books show against what they ought to show – and this is where management perspective comes into it. For example, it is all very well proving that the rate of wastage of materials in a manufacturing process is correctly recorded. It is quite another to be satisfied that this rate is not above what is acceptable.

Another illustration of this kind of approach can be seen in relation to stock control records. One of the companies in my group is a trading company selling tools, protective clothing and other such items to contractors, local authorities, etc. At each depot there are over one thousand different items in stock and stock control records are maintained. Those records are used to evaluate the stock monthly and, of course, for the year-end accounts. A continual test inventory process is carried out by depot staff. In addition, the external auditors have always checked certain items against the records when visiting the depots quarterly, but their interest is to satisfy themselves as to the probable accuracy of the stock figure in the balance sheet.

Now that my department is responsible for depot visits and it has been established that we have a management audit role to play, our attitude to the records is somewhat different. Of course, we are still interested in the accuracy of the records as reflecting the value of actual stock on hand and as a check on the storekeeper, but equally, if not more important is the fact that if the records are inaccurate the telephone salesman, on receipt of an inquiry from a customer, may give erroneous information as to what goods are in stock. If the customer then sends his lorry ten miles to the depot to collect the goods he needs he is going to be most upset if when he arrives, he is told by the storekeeper that the goods are not in fact in stock. Another aspect of this is the reason why the records are inaccurate. If this is due to carelessness on the part of the records clerk it is bad enough, but if it is due to inaccurate dispatch of goods or incorrect details on dispatch notes, customer dissatisfaction is even

So we see that in going about his task the management auditor has the management viewpoint in mind and is thinking not so much about the pure accuracy of figures but the implications of inaccurate figures and inefficient procedures.

A development within the general sphere of management auditing which has come about – particularly in the U.S.A. and which we are now using to an increasing extent in Britain – is what is called the 'operational audit'. In this concept we really get right away from the financial audit. The approach is to select an activity, rather than a department, for deep study, review and appraisal.

For example, we may decide that the purchasing function of the company needs to be looked at. We examine the whole function, cutting right across departmental demarcation lines. In such a review we would look at the procedure from the time a department decides that it needs a particular article or commodity, through the purchasing process, right up to the procedure for payment and charge to expenses in the accounts.

We would review the operations of the purchasing department as to the factors required for effective purchasing, co-operation and co-ordination with other departments, control policy over the department, authorization for purchase, selection of the right supplier, negotiation of price and settlement terms, issuance and follow-up of the order, receipt and inspection of goods, authorization of payment, operation of stores, sale of scrap, and so on and so on.

Similar audits can be carried out on transport functions, scrap salvage and surplus materials, control over goods intake, the use of facilities and services, advertising marketing and sales promotion, insurance coverage, and so on ad infinitum.

Audits of this type are now becoming quite common and often they result in cost saving and profit improvement in readily measurable amounts.

Now, having completed this review and appraisal of a department, a function, or a whole company, there must be something to show – and there is, of course, a report. This is the test of the skill and effectiveness of the auditor. A good report, well reasoned, will pay handsome dividends. A badly written report may well do harm. An essential rule is that any recommendation in a report should have been discussed first with all the people concerned. They may not all agree at this stage, but at least opposing views can be recorded and, if necessary, arbitrated by top management.

Similarly it is essential that any matters of fact mentioned should be incontrovertible. There is nothing more conducive to ruining the effectiveness of an otherwise good report than the inclusion of an erroneous statement of fact. This may be simply because the auditor put a question to the wrong person and got the wrong answer.

The subject of audit reports could occupy an entire paper in itself but suffice to say that the overall effectiveness of the job done depends entirely on the report, the distribution it receives and the effectiveness of the follow-up action taken afterwards.

I trust I have said enough to convince you that the modern approach to internal auditing can contribute distinctly to the profitability and efficiency of any business and that this is a service which management should give serious thought to providing. In a talk given by Sir Henry Benson, reproduced in The Accountant, he ended by saying:

'Finally I would like to say that in my opinion internal audit is a feature of business life which is becoming of increasing importance; not only because of the trend towards even larger combinations of companies but also because of recent failures which have shaken the city. Some of these might well have been prevented had the boards concerned seen fit to set up an effective audit department.'

I can really add nothing to that conclusion.

THE ACCOUNTING WORLD

Winding Up of Deceased Estates

Controversy in South Africa Resolved

by OUR SOUTH AFRICAN CORRESPONDENT

Thas always been a principle of South African law that any person may be nominated to act as executor or agent for the executor of a deceased estate, regardless of the nominated person's calling in life or of his experience in winding up deceased estates.

For more than one hundred years accountants have been available to act as executors, whether as executor testamentary when nominated by will, or as executor dative where there was no will or where the executor nominate has either refused to act or has predeceased the testator. Indeed, since about the turn of the century, chartered accountants have been trained and examined in both the law relating to the administration of deceased estates and in the preparation of the accounts of executors.

Moves to change law

In past years there have been several abortive moves to change the law and to have the winding-up of deceased estates declared as the exclusive prerogative of members of the legal profession. The latest move in this direction started some four years ago when various amendments to the Attorneys, Notaries and Conveyancers Admission Act were enacted. These amendments, inter alia, empowered the responsible Minister to frame regulations prohibiting the performance of certain acts by any person other than an attorney, notary, conveyancer or law agent.

Early in 1965 it became known that regulations under this heading were being drafted for submission to the responsible Minister for consideration, and that an attempt was once again being made to have the windingup of deceased estates made the close preserve of attorneys. Several attempts were made by the accountancy profession to initiate discussions with the powersthat-be in the legal profession regarding the proposals but all met with little or no response.

Representations were made to the responsible Minister, and the leaders of the accountancy profession were advised to seek agreement on the matter with the legal profession before the latter submitted their proposed regulations to the Minister for his approval and promulgation. The matter was even raised in Parliament in the 1966 session when the Minister of Justice assured the House of his confidence that the disagreement could be settled to the satisfaction of all concerned because the members of the legal profession were reasonable people. Nevertheless, discussions at various levels dragged on for months without much progress being made.

Despite, however, the Ministerial assurance, the discussions, and all attempts to reach an amicable solution, draft regulations were published on October 27th, 1967, prohibiting the performance of a number of acts by any person other than an attorney, notary, conveyancer or law agent, and it was announced that comment or representations thereon were required to be submitted on or before November 30th, 1967 – that was, just one month ahead.

The acts intended to be reserved for exclusive performance by members of the legal profession included not only the liquidation and distribution of deceased estates (with the minor exception that chartered accountants, inter alia, were to be permitted to act where they were nominated as executor testamentary by the testator), but many other types of work which appeared, in one way or another, to encroach on work hitherto habitually and regularly performed by accountants in the course of public practice. Such work included the carrying out of preparatory work in connection with applications to and appearances before the Special Income Tax Courts; assistance with estate planning prior to the preparation of wills; variations in the terms of partnership agreements or of trusts or settlements; the preparation of papers in connection with applications under the Rents Act, the Licences Act and various other statutes; assistance in the making of arrangements with creditors for acceptance of payment by instalments, and so on.

Action by accountancy profession

As the time for making representations was so short, the accountancy profession went into action immediately. A lengthy memorandum was submitted to the Minister by the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board and another by the National Council of Chartered Accountants (S.A.). The various provincial societies of accountants held protest meetings in the larger cities, and individual accountants and other interested persons lodged their private views regarding the proposals. National Council went to the length of publishing a statement protesting publicly against the proposals which would deprive accountants of their long-established rights in these matters.

Finally, on December 8th, 1967, a joint deputation from the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board and

The WOLSHOD that was going to Waste

"Waste! Sheer, downright waste. Of plant, rent, rates — the lot!" Bob Sharples threw down his cigarette end in disgust on the workshop floor and ground it out under his heel.

His brother, Joe, nodded grimly. "At a time when the country's crying out for productivity and all the rest of it," he said. "And all because people take so long to pay... and we're so short of capital. Oh, well. Better get a bite to eat, I suppose. Coming, Bob?"

The two brothers, joint directors of a small but efficient firm producing special parts for the machine tool industry, went out to their lunch at the local deep in thought.

At the Swan that day they ran into an old school-friend, Frank Grimes, now a successful accountant. Over a beer and a sandwich they talked. They told him about the underutilisation of their workshop. How they had no difficulty in getting orders — but quite a bit of bother in getting their money. And how they had had to make a rule:—"Payment in 7 days or we can't take the order."

"That must cramp your operation a lot," said Frank. "It's not the way to do it these days. Why don't you look into Credit Factoring?"

So that was where and how Shield Factors came into the story. Shield now look after their customers' credit requirements and the Sharples brothers have been able to concentrate on production and sales.

The result is that not only is their workshop fully employed but they are about to extend, as well. With Shield they have an assured cash in-flow each month, the amount depending only on their sales and deliveries. And, like all Shield clients, they need never have another bad debt; they are saved the cost and bother of ledger keeping, debt collection and account rendering;

they have access to additional finance when they need it. If you ask the Sharples they'll tell you it was a great day for them when they got in touch with Shield Factors. But don't just ask the Sharples. Ask Shield direct. They'll give you all the answers to all your questions. And quickly, too.

* Details of Shield service are given in this booklet: "Credit Factoring", a copy of which is waiting for you. Write or 'phone (asking for Mr. F. R. Salinger or for Mr. E. S. Davis) and it will be sent to you by return.

• the National Council of Chartered Accountants (S.A.) was received by the Minister of Justice to discuss the draft regulations. Subsequently an announcement was issued with the approval of the Minister, in the following terms:

'On December 8th, 1967, the Minister of Justice received a joint deputation from the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board and the National Council of Chartered Accountants (S.A.) to discuss the recently published draft regulations prohibiting the performance of certain acts by any person other than an attorney, notary, conveyancer or law agent.

'The Minister authorized the deputation to announce that when the regulations are promulgated in their final form, accountants in public practice will be treated on the same basis as boards of executors and trust companies. The consequence of this is that public accountants as defined in the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Act 1951 and registered under that Act, will be entitled to act as executors whether or not they are nominated by will.

As a result, they will be able to act as executors testamentary, executors dative, assumed executors and as agents for executors.

'The deputation agreed that the drawing of wills was a matter for the legal profession. The Minister conceded, however, that it was necessary for accountants to assist clients with documents required for this purpose in so far as they relate to information required for the preparation of wills, provided that they do not purport to be draft wills.

'The other matters dealt with in the joint representations of the Board and National Council on the draft regulations were discussed with the Minister and the deputation was given to understand that the points made would receive favourable consideration and that the accountancy profession would not be adversely affected.

'This resolves all matters outstanding in connection with the draft regulations to the satisfaction of the accounting profession and it wishes to express its appreciation to the Minister for the way in which this matter has been so amicably settled.'

Rhodesia Society's Fiftieth Anniversary

ADINNER to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of The Rhodesia Society of Accountants was held in Salisbury on Thursday of last week. The principal toast of the evening, to the Society, was proposed by Mr W. E. Parker, C.B.E., F.C.A., President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, who, together with Mr C. Evan-Jones, M.B.E., Secretary of the Institute, is at present on a visit to Africa. The President and Mr Evan-Jones will later be visiting South Africa and Kenya.

In the course of his speech at the dinner, Mr Parker expressed the good wishes to the English Institute on the celebration of the Society's fiftieth birthday, and paid tribute to the sound and vigorous way in which the Society had developed. He placed particular emphasis on the strengthening of the ties which linked all accountants as members of a great international profession. He went on:

'It is indeed a great profession. In large measure now it is the guardian of the ethical standards of commercial life, it is the protector of the investing public, it provides the business community with a fund of wise, objective and experienced advice without which in these days few can fully succeed or surmount their difficulties; and it is playing an ever more important role in the constructive use of accounting as an aid to management and as a basis for current policy decisions and appraisal of the future.

'Nor is its greatness any the less because the profession is still young and has developed, and is continuing to develop, rapidly. In the lifetime of an individual fifty years is a long time, and, if my arithmetic is sound, a hundred years is twice as long as that. In the march of world events these periods of time are trivial. And yet only a hundred years ago the profession's almost exclusive concern was with insolvency. The development of the auditing functions followed after that, then our services in the field of taxation. Finally, the development of "management accounting" and all that goes with it (including computers) is a product of barely more than the last twenty years.

'This rapid development of our profession, itself taking place amid no less rapid developments in almost every other sphere, raises formidable problems. Speaking only of our professional work, there is so much to learn and it has to be learnt so quickly. So little time can be spared to question and to rethink the doctrines we are taught. We are apt almost driven - to accept them unquestioningly as the laws of the Medes and Persians, addressing ourselves only to putting them into practice. This is dangerous and utterly wrong. We must find time to question doctrine, to think why this is right and that is wrong, and when we do we shall discover that things are by no means so clear-cut. We shall find wholly opposed convictions, deeply and conscientiously held and well supported by logic and reason. Here then are two of the problems - how to find time for fundamental thinking and rethinking, and how to bring agreement out of controversy.

'A third aspect of these problems of development is the increasing impossibility of being expert in everything. This is no new problem. It was recognized 2,000 years ago by the Latin writer who said Nemo sapit in omnibus horis. Literally translated "Nobody is wise at all times"; freely translated "No-one knows all the answers", and is a great and growing problem for us in Britain and there is no doubt that, there at least, positive steps will have to be taken to promote much more consultancy and collaboration within the profession. This in turn raises practical problems of identifying specialist expertise, and ethical problems where the specialists are themselves also in general practice and therefore potential competitors of any general practitioner who may consult them. In the English Institute we are hard at work on these problems, but are finding them far from easy.'

In conclusion, Mr Parker expressed a strong belief in the brotherhood of the accountancy profession, transcending all boundaries of nationality and creed. He believed it to be potentially a great force for mutual understanding and collaboration.

I.C.T.

THE accounts of International Computers and Tabulators Ltd anticipate the requirements of the Companies Act 1967 and are therefore worth particular consideration. The first obvious change to meet the 1967 Act requirements is the addition of an appendix to the directors' report. The directors' report itself refers to 'certain changes in the basis of accounting' introduced during the year and refers readers to the appendix.

The appendix opens with a paragraph headed 'Principal activities' and I.C.T.'s are described as being 'devoted to the production, sale and rental of data processing systems, from the largest types of digital computer down to small punched-card installations. These activities range from basic research, through development and manufacture of the equipment, to the provision to customers of a comprehensive data processing service. The latter includes not only the machines and computer software but systems study, training of customers' staffs, a full after sales service and service bureaux facilities. Ancillary and peripheral equipment is supplied to other computer manufacturers.'

With such a description, the directors, in their commendable policy of anticipating the requirements of the new Companies Act, certainly give shareholders a wide view of the group's activities. The rest of the information in the appendix is more formally presented. The estimated market value of United Kingdom properties was £1,220,000 compared with a net book value of £851,000. No payments were made for political purposes and charitable donations totalled

Provisions

Further information in the appendix shows that group exports totalled £14.4 million; the average number of United Kingdom employees during the year under review was 21,167 and their total remuneration amounted to £22,612,000. For a number of years now I.C.T. have given the number of employees in the group both at home and overseas with comparisons back to 1960.

The appendix also provides details of the directors' shareholdings in the company and the directors' emoluments. It is stated that Sir Cecil Mead, as chairman and chief executive from the beginning of the year under review until his retirement on February 8th, 1967, received £22,000 in emoluments. During the remainder of the year Colonel A. T. Maxwell, in his appointment as chairman, received £9,000

But the most important point referred to is under the heading 'Changes in the accounts'. The profit and loss -. account now discloses the total provisions made in the year to cover both depreciation and obsolescence of data processing equipment whether for rental or I.C.T.'s own use, and the net balance sheet value of this equipment as a fixed asset is arrived at after deducting the whole of the provision.

Wherever possible, other provisions have been deducted from the assets to which they relate. The carry-forward of research expenditure in stock and work in progress at September 1966 has been written off, but net research and development costs have been absorbed into the manufacturing costs of the equipment produced, some of which was in stock at the end of the year.

Research

These changes, it is emphasized, have had no material effect overall on the year's profit. Comparative figures for the previous year in the accounts and in the supplementary statistics have been amended wherever possible to bring them into line with the changes affecting the 1966-67 figures. The pre-tax profit of £3,020,000 against £2,331,000 was 'in line with our planning', states Colonel Maxwell in his review which follows immediately after the appendix to the directors' report.

In the light of the results, the board would have liked to restore a major part of the cut in dividend made in 1965 by bringing the 1966-67 total payment up to 2s a share. But 'because of the Government's call for moderation in company distributions and the present national economic uncertainties', total dividend is limited to 1s 10d a share compared with a total of 18 8d a share for the two previous years.

It may be noted that the trading surplus for both years takes account of £1.5 million received under the group's agreement with the National Research Development Corporation. This support enables I.C.T. to undertake research and development on a scale which would not otherwise have been possible. The agreement provides for a further contribution of fir million in the current year.

The chairman says that I.C.T.'s needs for leasing finance are adequately covered for the foreseeable future.

Few problems

A point about I.C.T.'s anticipation of the 1967 Act is not the fact of anticipation itself, but that I.C.T. is the kind of company one would have expected to take such voluntary action. The company's accounts have been well presented in the past and in recent years have provided detail far in excess of the 1948 Act's requirements.

The company has been among the leaders in the presentation of informative accounts and anticipation of the 1967 Act has, for that reason, not entailed any vast reorganization of the report or the provision of a great deal of information that was not already and adequately given.

There are a number of leading companies which can be put in the same category as I.C.T. in this respect. But there are very many more which have lagged far behind the example provided by those enlightened organizations which have put the presentation of full information before considerations of whether or not the Act calls for the provision or whether the Stock Exchange has recommended it.

To these forward-looking companies the 1967 Act will. pose few problems. It has certainly not posed any problems

CITY NOTES

OVER the past three years the stock-market has become used to excessively sharp turns in economic events – even devaluation was taken with relative calm – and to the reintroduction of stop-go economics by a Government which had banished them.

This week's new package of Government cuts, reorganization and spending delays has called on the stock-market for further adjustment, but not to any major degree. There is, after all, still more adjustment to come in the shape of the Budget – whether early or normally timed.

Neither the present Government measures nor later Budget changes are likely to shift the majority of investors from their maintained and fervent view that ordinary shares, even if temporarily buffeted, are preferable to money.

That, in stock-market terms, is the point that matters—whether investors are going to be shaken out of their faith in equities. That faith waxed strong and was reinforced by devaluation last year and more faith is placed in the capacity for equities to offset the ravages of inflation than in the Government's ability to shape a proper economic policy.

Refresher Course for Accountancy Teachers

THE concern felt by the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales of the need for teachers of accountancy to keep themselves up to date with the latest developments in their field, as well as with new approaches to the problems of teachers, was apparent in the three-day refresher course for accountancy teachers held at the City University, London, at the beginning of the month.

The course, which was open to non-members of the Institute, was attended by full-time and part-time teachers and by the training managers from a number of the larger firms of chartered accountants.

Fourfold purpose

Members were welcomed by the Course Director, Mr C. H. Watson, F.A.C.C.A., F.C.C.S., Head of the Department of Business and Professional Studies, City of Westminster College, who outlined the purpose of the course which was primarily fourfold, i.e. to hear about the educational policy of the Institute, both in the short-term and long-term; to have the opportunity of attending lectures, followed by discussions, on topics of immediate concern to all engaged in teaching – particularly the numerous problems they meet in teaching or organizing courses and how these problems can be solved.

The first address was given by Mr A. W. John, C.B.E., F.C.A., a member of the Council of the Institute and Vice-Chairman of the Education Committee, on 'The educational policy of the Institute' with regard to training of prospective chartered accountants. He expressed the view that oral tuition would gradually become more and more important in meeting the requirements of entrants to the accountancy profession if they were to be considered as being adequately trained to meet the ever-increasing demands placed upon the accountant.

The majority coming into accountancy in the future would in all probability have two or more 'A' levels, and would be required to pursue a course of full-time study of nine months' duration at one of the colleges approved by the Institute before proceeding to the practical work in the office of their principals. This would be followed later by further short courses of study, where possible at the colleges where they had carried out their nine-month study. This involved numerous problems which were constantly being considered by the Education Committee.

It was necessary for accountancy teachers to be prepared for this new influx of trainees and to ensure that the students received the appropriate theoretical background to accounting and allied subjects before proceeding to the professional firm for their practical training.

Dr Ruth M. Beard, M.SC., M.A., PH.D., of the University of London Institute of Education, addressed the course on 'Effective teaching'. She suggested that teachers must define their objectives in teaching – whether they be long-term professional objectives, intermediate objectives such as acquisition of certain bodies of information, skills or attitudes, or short-term objectives which served as a stimulus to learning.

Dr Beard proceeded to discuss individual differences of psychologists which indicated bias in the way that learning is viewed and that there were individual preferences for particular approaches. She went on to say that although there was no clear-cut relation between objectives and teaching methods, there was evidence that certain methods might be effective for different purposes; for example, programmed learning could be very effective in imparting information speedily, or free discussion in small groups might be used to foster critical thinking. It was pointed out that whatever methods were used, it was of the greatest importance that objectives should be clearly defined and their achievement assessed. The talk concluded with a consideration of methods of evaluation, learning and teaching.

New methods and teaching aids

Mr J. V. R. Anderson, M.A., F.C.A., spoke on 'New methods and aids in teaching'. He commenced by considering the new attitude to teaching accountancy and the status of the teacher. The use of the correspondence course was discussed — both its use in conjunction with articles and its place in a planned scheme of tuition. Oral tuition was then considered, whether used alone or in conjunction with a correspondence course.

Aids to communication considered included the blackboard, overhead projectors, slide projectors, and lecture handouts – each being discussed at length. The speaker emphasized the need for feed-back and went on to deal with such related matters as programmed notes, quiz questions, formal tests, tutorials. Teaching machines, films, closed-circuit television and video tapes were also reviewed. The lecturer concluded by saying that any method which stimulated interest must be rewarded in the examination.

The Course Director contributed a paper on 'Management information' which he dealt with under six headings – definitions, management, communication, information, reporting and applications, the subject-matter under each heading being fully illustrated.

A film on 'Responsibility accounting' followed, dealing with the presentation of information to all levels of management from the managing director to the foreman on the factory floor.

Members of the course then divided into four syndicates to discuss and report back on 'The syllabus content, teaching methods, etc., of a course of study for accountants trained in the traditional manner who wish to participate more effectively as members of management teams'.

The first day concluded with a film on 'Modern auditing'. The second day commenced with a talk by Mr M. J. Mepham, B.Sc.(ECON.), F.C.A., A.C.W.A., University of Glasgow, on 'Economics and accountancy'; topics discussed covered management accountancy and management economics, financial accountancy and economics, macro-accountancy and macro-economics, social costbenefit analysis, and difficulties in the integration of accountancy and economics – the last topic being divided into terminological difficulties and the theory of the firm.

'Office methods – the use of mechanized and electronic equipment' was the subject of a lecture by Mr A. W. Howitt, M.A., F.C.A., who emphasized the need for teachers to ensure that they keep fully abreast of this equipment and also in systems analysis, to ensure that students were adequately introduced to the subject of electronic data processing. He emphasized, however, that in his opinion, teaching should commence with a description of handwritten records, then follow with book-keeping machines, punched-card equipment and, finally, computers.

The next talk was given by Mr E. R. Nicholson, F.C.A., on 'Practical applications of the Companies Act 1967'. He outlined many matters which required serious consideration by accountants and teachers of accountancy arising from the Act.

A second talk by Mr Mepham was on 'The accountant and mathematics', the topics of matrix algebra and accountancy, and linear programming and accountancy, being dealt with at length. The day's proceedings were brought to a close with two further films on electronic data processing.

The final day of the course commenced with a talk by the Course Director on 'Accountancy in business study courses', at the conclusion of which members went into syndicates to discuss 'The content of courses, teaching methods, textbooks, etc., in courses other than those for professional accountancy examinations, such as National Diplomas and Certificates and C.N.A.A. degrees, also non-professional examinations'.

PERT/LOB - A Plan for all Seasons

Pert and Pert/Cost

NETWORK planning for a one-off production project, such as the construction of a building, is now a familiar technique. Once the principles were clearly understood, it was soon seen as merely a routine matter of analysing the various activities. Some activities require to be completed before the next stage can be started, and all the activities can therefore best be laid out along a time scale. This type of planning can conveniently be classified as PERT/Time.

But where investment is heavy, as in many construction projects, time is money. The next stage was therefore to associate to each activity, its cost. A variance in the time by which an activity is completed, i.e. an event, may not affect the final time by which the whole project is completed (unless the activity lies on the critical path) but it is likely to affect the budget schedule. PERT/Cost takes this factor into account.

Both PERT/Time and PERT/Cost, however, are designed for single, development type, projects. They are not appropriate for use in a factory where batch or continuous production is the rule. PERT/LOB takes care of this, representing an integration of basic PERT and LOB (line of balance).

Although PERT is a fairly well-known technique, LOB needs some explanation, and the remainder of this article is devoted to just this. (A precise explanation of the joint integrated techniques of PERT/LOB is given by Schoderbeck and Digman in their article 'Third Generation PERT/LOB' in Harvard Business Review for September/October 1967.)

LOB (line of balance)

The thinking behind LOB is simple. Suppose a stated number of units (part of a batch or a continuous production run perhaps) is needed by a certain date for sale or shipment. Suppose, further, that in the last stage of all, each unit has to be given several coats of paint, which take about a week. One week, therefore, before the sale or shipment date this stated number of units should be assembled, ready for painting.

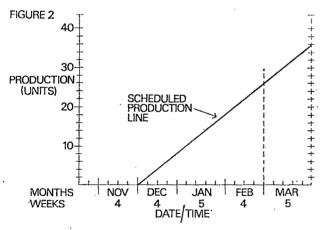

A check of the cumulative number of units which have arrived at this point (called a control point) will provide a measure of how well the actual production today at this control point compares with the target number. If the production is properly balanced, then the actual number of units will line up with the scheduled production (line of balance) at this point.

To continue this simple example: suppose there is a contract to produce thirty-six mobile weedkilling spray units for use on highways. Each unit consists essentially of a large tank and a spray section. Both these require modification before the spray section is attached to the tank. The assembled spray/tank section will then have to be lowered on to a chassis which will itself have had to undergo substantial modification beforehand. A simple network is as follows:

The planned production schedule, shown in Fig. 2, is based on a steady production rate of two completed units per week, starting December 1st. Since weedkilling is a seasonal activity it is important that this schedule is rigidly adhered to.

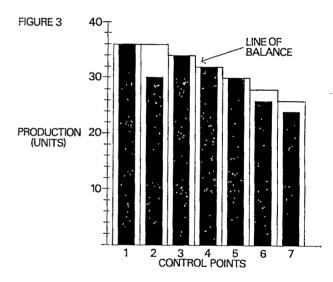

Let us now consider the position in detail at some particular point in time, say the end of February. This is five weeks before the end of the contract date. Since control points I and 2 have to be achieved (i.e. they have a 'lead' time) six and five weeks, respectively, before completion, it is easy to see that thirty-six units should have been checked at these control points. Control point 3 has a lead time of four weeks. From the production schedule we can see that four weeks after the end of February we need to have thirty-four units completed. It follows that thirty-four units should have been checked out at control point 3.

Similarly for control point 4 which has a lead time of three weeks. (The production chart three weeks after the end of February shows a scheduled production figure of thirty-two units.) It follows that thirty-two units should have been checked out at control point 4. A physical check will give the actual number which have been checked through each control point. The results in the form of a table might be:

•			, or
*	*		standard	Actual
Control point: 7		• •	26	24
6	• •		28	26
5			30	30
4			32	32
3			34	34
2			36	30
1			36	36

Usually, however, a chart form of presentation is better than a table. Fig. 3 shows very clearly the true position and highlights the differences between the standard or LOB figure (shown as a heavy line) and the actual (shown by a bar). Obviously, in the present example, control point 2 is the culprit. The deficiencies at control points 6 and 7 arise simply because they are 'downstream' from 2.

We have considered the position at one point in time only. In practice, LOB charts need to be repeatedly updated. The deterioration in the position at control point 2 would, no doubt, have been shown up in the chart for the previous week, or perhaps even earlier.

Generally the number of control points that it is desirable to use should not exceed fifty. If the production plan is highly complex and more than this number is necessary to keep a tight grip on the production situation, then for presentation purposes a number of related control points should be grouped up.

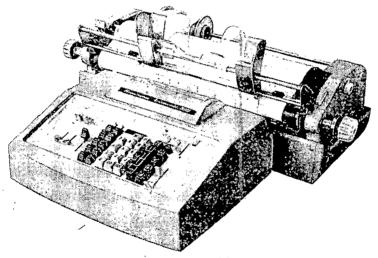

To sum up, LOB is a sequential scheduling technique applicable to batch or continuous production. It highlights the points at which the job, while it is still work in progress, is falling behind schedule. It shows up this position at an early stage, and so allows effective remedial action to be taken. It is obvious from its nature that it is almost ideally suited for computerization. It seems certain that it will prove to be the most important planning technique since the original PERT.

OBITUARY

Dudley W. Hooper, M.A., F.C.A.

It was with very deep regret that we learned of the death on Friday of last week, at the age of 57, of Mr Dudley W. Hooper, M.A., F.C.A., Technical Officer of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales.

Educated at Charterhouse and Clare College, Cambridge, where he gained a degree in natural sciences, Mr Hooper on coming down from Cambridge in 1932 commenced in articles with Messrs William S. Ogle Sons & Porter, Chartered Accountants, of London, and in 1936 was admitted to membership of the Institute. From 1936 to 1937, he was secretary and accountant of the Trepur Paper Tube Co Ltd and was also director and secretary of Enna Ltd, paper pulp moulders. He then became chief accountant to the Merchant Navy Officers Pension Fund where he remained until 1940.

Following war service with the Royal Army Service Corps as a staff officer serving mainly overseas, including Ethiopia and the Somalilands, Mr Hooper joined Marshalls Food Products Ltd in 1946 as chief accountant. He left this appointment in 1947 to become the British and American editor and publisher of The Office Machine Manual and Office Control and Management.

He joined the National Coal Board in 1948 as a technical specialist on the application of accounting machines and to advise on systems and methods. In 1954 he was appointed chief organizing accountant of the Coal Board, responsible for the application of computers for data processing.

Mr Hooper was appointed to the then new post of Technical Officer of the Institute in November 1964. Prior to joining the secretariat of the Institute he was a member of the Automatic Data Processing Sub-Committee of the Institute's Technical Advisory Committee.

Associated with the preliminary discussions regarding the Certificate in Management Information, he became well known to members of the profession for devising the Institute's electronic data processing and management information courses.

Mr Hooper was associated throughout practically his whole career with the many aspects of office equipment. He was a founder member and the first Chairman of the London Computer Group as well as being first Chairman of the Council of the British Computer Society and its President from 1961 to 1962.

Gabriel Brock, F.C.A.

Mr Gabriel Brock, whose death occurred on December 30th, practised as a chartered accountant in Dublin from 1913 when he was admitted a member of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland, until 1949 when, still an outstanding figure in his profession, he retired from active practice in order to devote his whole time to his other interests, and particularly his work as chairman of the Provincial Bank of Ireland and as one of the Associated Banks' representatives on the board of the Central Bank.

Mr Brock's association with banking began in 1927 when he was appointed auditor of the Provincial Bank of Ireland. He was afterwards co-opted to the board of directors, and became the Bank's chairman in 1946. Elected a Fellow of the Institute of Bankers in Ireland, his appointment as President for 1951 followed. He was also a director and later chairman of Swift Brook Paper Mills Ltd and was on the board of the Dublin Gas Co and other companies.

It was characteristic of the man that once committed to any undertaking there should be no stint in his efforts to promote its success, and in no sphere was this more evident than in his work for The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland, of which he acted as Honorary Secretary and Treasurer from 1920 to 1934, and later served as a member of the Council from 1931 to 1946. While a member of the Council he was a delegate of the Institute to the International Congresses in New York (1929), London (1933) and Berlin (1938), and represented the Institute in 1938 at the celebrations marking the fiftieth anniversary of the American Institute of Accountants.

From 1920, after his election as Hon. Secretary and Treasurer, until 1934, when the increasing administrative activities of the Institute necessitated the appointment of a part-time Secretary, Gabriel Brock's tireless devotion to its interests was of inestimable value to the Institute. This was recognized by his colleagues when the Council in 1937 was looking forward to the arrangements for the Institute's Jubilee in 1938 and two members of the Council, themselves leading members of the profession who in the ordinary way would have preceded him in the chair, stood aside so that he should preside as President over the celebrations. He was accordingly elected President in 1937 and presided at the jubilee banquet in July 1938, continuing in office until May

His interest in the profession did not cease with his resignation from the Council in 1946, and in 1951 he accepted appointment as a representative of the Institute on the Company Law Reform Committee, and in 1952 as a delegate of the Institute at the Sixth International Congress in London.

Despite the demands of his business commitments, Mr Brock found time to serve on the board of the Meath Hospital from 1942 to 1965, and for no less than thirty-six years – from 1925 to 1961 – he took an active part in the administration of St Andrew's College, Dublin. St Andrew's is deeply in his debt, not only for his unsparing efforts on its behalf over so many years, but for his generous help to the fund raised to finance the building and equipping of new science laboratories.

He lived an active life in retirement so far as advancing years and illness permitted. Tennis and golf, to which he was addicted as a young man, were in later years replaced by angling. No days were ever happier for him than fishing holidays in the West of Ireland.

DOUBLE TAXATION RELIEF: MALAYSIA

An Order in Council relating to the Double Taxation Agreement with Malaysia relating to taxes on income was made on December 20th, 1967, and has now been published as Statutory Instrument 1967, No. 1925.

CAPITAL ALLOWANCES (RELEVANT GRANTS) ORDER

Section 35 of the Finance Act 1966 entitles the Treasury to prescribe grants as 'relevant' with the consequence that expenditure in respect of which the grant is paid will be disqualified from investment and initial allowances for tax purposes. The Capital Allowances (Relevant Grants) Order (No. 2) 1967 now published (S.I. 1967 No. 1945), so prescribes grants for the provision of new business assets under the Capital Grants to Industry Act (Northern Ireland) 1954, the Industries Development Act (Northern Ireland) 1966 and the Industrial Investment (General Assistance) Act (Northern Ireland) 1966.

Holders of the maturing $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent Defence Bonds who decide not to accept the conversion offer should apply for repayment. No interest will be payable on the Bonds after they mature on May 1st, 1968.

Those who accept the offer of conversion will receive on May 1st, 1968, the final interest payment on the matured Defence Bonds, at 4½ per cent per annum for the period November 1st, 1967, to April 30th, 1968, together with the maturity premium of £5 per cent on Bonds exchanged. The list of acceptances of the conversion offer will be closed on February 2nd.

FINALISTS

It is not too early for the forward thinking Finalist to plan the next stage in his career. In this connection an important factor is

BALANCED EXPERIENCE

A correct balance in experience is imperative as the precursor to a highly successful career either in the profession or in commerce or industry. Often service under articles will of necessity result in a biased type of early stage competence. The corrective is a new appointment which will ensure a compensatory broadening of experience. Our advice is expert and objective and we are in a position to effect introductions to the right type of new appointment. An appointment for a discussion can be arranged by writing or telephoning to our director.

The Way to the Top - This is the title of a brochure written especially for Finalists. A copy will be dispatched immediately on request.

Future Profession Takes Shape

THE decision of the English Institute – the official announcement is reproduced on another page – to seek to bring its entry requirements in line with the minimum entry conditions of the universities is to be welcomed. The Scottish and Irish Institutes, together with the I.M.T.A., have already either adopted or declared their intention to adopt such standards.

The case for such a change is self-evident. Present-day educational opportunity is such that the school-leaver, who before the war entered articles at 16 or soon after with the then General Schools Certificate, is now able to win his way into university and obtain a degree. If the intellectual standards of the profession are to be fully maintained, it is from these categories of the younger population to which the accountancy profession must in future look for most of its recruits.

Equally significant is the announcement that the English Institute is contemplating the introduction of a junior qualification. For this, the obvious entrance requirement would appear to be five 'O' levels. Such a development is the logical corollary of the higher entrance requirements for the major professional qualification. In recent times the character of the professional accountant's work has changed enormously. It can be only a matter of time before the content of the Certificate of Management Information finds its place in the Final examinations of the professional bodies. While the nineteenth-century conception of the accountant-cumbook-keeper dies hard in some circles, the plain fact is that a training in modern accountancy constitutes a major route to the boardroom and top management.

It would be ridiculous to pretend that every entrant into the profession will set his sights so high. At the same time, it has been well said that most accountants when they reach the top are concerned only with supervising others preparing accounts; their task is interpretation. It is in the middle grades of the accountant's work, therefore, where a qualification such as Licentiate of the Institute is needed. The legal profession already has its Institute of Legal Executives, but there is much to be said for including those who have passed a special Institute examination within the body of the Institute.

It will be interesting to see the reaction of members to the Institute's proposals. In the past the English Institute has sometimes been accused of responding too slowly to change. Of late that criticism is no longer warranted. The present proposals make it clear that the momentum is being fully maintained.

Comparison of Inventory Practices

International Study Group Report

THE International Study Group formed jointly at the end of 1966 by The American Institute of Certified Public Accountants, The Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland and The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland, has just published its first survey. The group's terms of reference, it will be remembered, were:

'To institute comparative studies as to accounting thought and practice in participating countries, to make reports from time to time, which, subject to the prior approval of the sponsoring Institutes, would be issued to members of those Institutes', and it has chosen to make a start with a paper entitled Accounting and Auditing Approaches to Inventories in Three Nations. The term 'inventory', commonly used in North America, has been preferred to the United Kingdom's 'stock' which, on the other side of the Atlantic, suggests 'share capital'.

The scope of the treatment accorded to the subject by the group was a comparison of accepted accounting and auditing approaches to inventories by the three countries concerned. It is well known that much has been written about inventories on a national basis but that hitherto no forum has existed in which the degree of unanimity of practices and standards could be assessed and important differences thus revealed highlighted. The group's studies in this respect do not claim to be definitive. Its fourfold object in undertaking the project was - to restate the present recognized practices of the three nations from a common standpoint; to draw attention to the major similarities and differences; to indicate areas requiring further study; and to indicate, albeit tentatively, how the best international practices could be consolidated.

One of the first things the group had to realize was that although in theory accounting and auditing principles should know no national frontiers, in practice certain 'local' influences stand in the way of complete uniformity. These are, mainly, the financial reporting requirements imposed by law as exemplified by the Companies Acts of the United Kingdom; additional or alternative requirements on certain classes of undertaking insisted on by (say) the Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States; official pronouncements by accountancy bodies which, although not mandatory, carry considerable weight; and, finally, observance of fiscal codes for the purpose of defining profits for taxation purposes. For simplification, the group elected to assume that its model for demonstration purposes was a trading corporation or limited company already equipped with a sophisticated accounting system and obliged by its constitution to publish audited accounts annually.

Having thus set the stage, the group begins by establishing the meaning of the term 'inventory' and selects the following definition from the American Institute's Accounting Research Bulletin No. 43:

'The term inventory is used herein to designate the aggregate of those items of tangible... property which (I) are held for sale in the ordinary course of business, (2) are in process of production for such sale, or (3) are to be currently consumed in the production of goods or services to be available for sale.'

The Bulletin continues:

"The term inventory embraces goods awaiting sale (the merchandise of a trading concern and the finished goods of a manufacturer), goods in the course of production (work in process) and goods to be consumed directly or indirectly in production (raw materials and supplies). This definition of inventories excludes long-term assets subject to depreciation accounting, or goods which when put into use, will be so classified. The fact that a depreciable asset is retired from regular use and held for sale does not indicate that the item should be classified as part of the inventory. Raw materials and supplies purchased for production may be used or consumed for the construction of long-term assets or other purposes not related to production, but the fact that inventory items representing a small proportion of the total may not be absorbed ultimately in the production process does not require separate classification. . . .

In most financial accounts of manufacturing and trading companies, the inventory figure is usually reckoned to be the second largest item after fixed assets constituting as it does about 25 per cent of total assets net of depreciation and other offsets. The multiplicity and the transience of the individual units which make up the average inventory render verification difficult and the group points out that in a recent sample of 1,800 United Kingdom companies, the overall ratio of inventories to pre-tax profits was 5: 2 so that, assuming constancy in inventory and income levels, an error of plus or minus 5 per cent in the inventory valuation would have affected profit levels in the sample for the operative periods by plus or minus 12.5 per cent.

The group emphasizes that the inventory cannot be divorced from the other operations of a business and is therefore the responsibility of management. The measure of the success of management is the profitability of the company managed as expressed in its financial statements. As these statements are audited it is essential to define the duties of the auditor with particular regard to the inventory. While the auditor must form and express an opinion on the fairness or otherwise of the methods used to arrive at the valuation presented, these methods and the totals they evolve are, like the other items in the accounts, the fundamental responsibility of the management.

The accountancy profession in each of the three group countries appreciates the importance of this distinction by recommending auditors to obtain from management 'a written statement regarding the ascertainment of inventory quantities and valuations'. The significance of this letter or statement is that it constitutes a record of the action taken by management and is an acknowledgement of the responsibility therefor. That the group also recognizes the importance of this document is shown by the fact that it gives in an appendix a form of inventory 'letter or certificate' in common use in Canada.

To secure as far as possible the safety of the inventory's contents and the maintenance of accurate records of them, management should establish adequate internal controls. These procedures should ensure that inventories are maintained at appropriate physical levels, are safeguarded against loss or misuse, are properly applied for the purpose for which they were bought and are duly accounted for. It is on his appraisal of the effectiveness of these procedures instituted by management that the auditor will be able to gauge the extent of the checks he thinks it necessary to make.

In reviewing the considerations governing internal control, the group suggests that as a first step the inventory should be dissected into the three main divisions—raw materials, work in progress, and finished goods—and that thereafter each of these classifications should be subdivided into suitable classes of items. Each main class of goods can then be judged by three criteria—value, susceptibility to misappropriation and saleable life.

Two other factors which have to be reckoned with in this connection are the extent to which management can exercise central control over inventories—goods in safe keeping in one place are easier to account for than the same quantity spread over a number of places or in transit; and goods in the custody of the company's officials are more under the direct control of management than goods held by outsiders.

As well as seeing that inventories are properly housed, guarded and maintained physically, management – because its stewardship is ultimately expressed in the terms of financial statements – has two more obligations towards the goods under its control and these are to make certain that they are both accurately quantified and fairly priced. The first of these duties is facilitated by what in America and Canada is known as the 'perpetual inventory' and in the United Kingdom as 'continuous stock records'. This method of recording, in one form or another, is known to every accountant and helps greatly in the task of confirmation by physical inspection, an exercise regarded in all three countries as 'the single most important internal control procedure for inventories'.

It is not surprising then that, in view of their importance, the group devotes one-third of its survey each to considering physical inspection of the inventory for control purposes and to the problems of valuation. The frequency of physical inspection is, like so many other matters relating to management, a question of skill and judgement. There is a convention that all categories of goods should be so checked once a year but the need varies with the nature of the business, the character and variety of the goods held and the rate of turnover of the different classifications. Timing is another factor and in cyclical businesses advantage should be taken of low inventory levels.

The group discusses the procedures for physical inspection in considerable detail. It favours the view that the check should be regarded as 'a form of sampling of a proportion of a total throughput of a continuous flow of goods rather than as a static exercise'. It stresses, also, that special attention should be paid to 'cut-off' procedures and that regard should be had not only to quantities but to the saleable condition of the goods being checked. Work in progress presents special problems and it is suggested that recourse should be made when required to costing records the reliability of which would, of course, have to be tested.

In America, the attendance of the auditor as an observer at physical inventories is virtually mandatory. Indeed, even if he were not present but satisfies himself as to the accuracy of the inventory by other means he must state in his report that he has relied on alternative procedures which, in this context, 'means additional procedures distinct from and extra to those usually followed when forming an opinion on inventories'. Canadian practice is similar to that of America except that the auditor need not specify if he has satisfied himself as to the accuracy of the inventory by means other than attendance at the count. In the United Kingdom, the attendance of the auditor at inventory counts is not obligatory but it is coming to be recognized as highly desirable.

With some reluctance but for the sake of brevity, the group uses the word 'valuation' to indicate the monetary amount at which inventories are stated in accounts. The English Institute's term is 'the amount at which stock is stated' or 'the amount at which stock is carried forward' and the corresponding phrase in American practice is 'the amount attributed to inventory'. In all three countries, the primary basis for valuation of inventories is their purchase or production cost, less any part which it is deemed appropriate to write off at the balance sheet date. Only in a few special cases are inventories stated in accounts at amounts in excess of cost. On the other hand, anticipated losses should be provided for in the accounts for the current period.

The elements of cost to be included in inventory, as laid down in Recommendation 22 of the English Institute, are direct expenditure on purchase of goods for resale and materials and components used in the manufacture of finished goods; other expenditure connected with these purchases such as direct labour, transport, processing and packaging; and, in some cases, a relevant portion of overheads. These elements of costs have to be matched with the flow of goods to which they relate and for this purpose the most commonly accepted bases are 'first in first out' (FIFO) and 'last in first out' (LIFO).

It is noted by the group that all three countries incline towards the FIFO basis and that only in America does LIFO seem to be used to any extent. In this connection, fiscal considerations have had some bearing. Income computed on the LIFO basis is not acceptable in the United Kingdom and Canada for tax purposes. The LIFO basis is accepted by the American tax authorities who insist, however, that the books and accounts of the user company must conform with that basis.

The other principal respect in which the practices of the three countries differ is in the treatment of overheads. In America, the exclusion of all overheads from inventory costs is not regarded as sound accounting practice. In Canada, opinion seems to vary with circumstances as also it does in the United Kingdom, although the group states that there is evidence to suggest that some British companies 'exclude all overheads from inventory costs'. After considering the whole range of valuation methods at length, the group comes to the catholic conclusion that 'the element of judgement is fundamental to inventory appraisal, and cannot be replaced by a set of mechanistic rules'.

The five general conclusions which the group lists at the end of what must be one of the most readable dissertations on inventories ever written, may be summarized as follows:

- (r) The amount to be attributed to inventories is of fundamental importance in the preparation of the financial accounts of most trading undertakings.
- (2) The maintenance of adequate inventory records is a primary responsibility of management who must also ensure that inventories are managed and safeguarded under an efficient system of internal control.
- (3) Inventories should be physically inspected under proper supervision at appropriate intervals.
- (4) Attendance to observe physical inspection of inventories is a most significant audit verification procedure which should be adopted as internationally recognized standard practice.
- (5) In general, inventories should be valued on a consistent basis from year to year at the lower of cost (including the overheads considered appropriate) and market, as in America; or the lower of cost and net realizable value, as in the United Kingdom and Canada. The accounts should state the basis of valuation adopted. The effect on the accounts of any material change in the basis of valuation between one year's end and the next should be noted. Auditors should carry out such audit tests on the inventories as they think necessary. The differences of emphasis which exist as regards recognized bases of inventory valuation among the three countries is a subject for further study, research and discussion.

The group concludes its reflections with two searching questions, posed because in its opinion 'the establishment of standards of best practice does not automatically ensure their observance and achievement in actuality'. The questions are:

'... how many other undertakings are there – not necessarily insignificant in size – which fall short of best practice because they are bound by, or assume, less stringent obligations and standards than their more progressive or more strictly regulated contemporaries? Equally, how many auditors in such circumstances consciously or unconsciously modify their own standards?'

We ourselves end with a question. How many accountants, whether concerned with management or as auditors, will truthfully be able to say after reading the group's survey that they have not a much clearer conception of the purpose and significance of inventories than they had before?

Scottish Institute Study on Stock Valuation

FOR the past three years the Research and Publications Committee of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland has been engaged in investigations which led to the appearance this week of a study entitled Valuation of Stock and Work in Progress (price 2s 6d), based on information received from about 300 manufacturing and trading companies in the United Kingdom. The questionnaire was sent to a random sample of nearly 2,000 concerns drawn from the Stock Exchange Year Book and Sell's Directory and, at a later stage, those appearing in The Times Review of Industry and Technology's top 300 companies.

Although some of the results brought out by an analysis of the data obtained may be statistically unreliable because of the disappointing smallness of the sample, the committee believes that the inquiry was well worth while and that, in particular, two conclusions of great importance to the accountancy profession may be drawn. These, in the committee's words, are that:

- (a) there are considerable variations in the method of calculating the 'cost' of stocks for the purpose of annual balance sheets; and
- (b) these variations do not arise from the type of business carried on or from the size of the concern.

Two other somewhat alarming findings are – that the survey discloses little correlation between the size of the organization and the sophistication of the stock valuation methods employed; and that a large number of companies rely on the review of an executive for the write-down in values of obsolete or surplus stock. Only 20 per cent of the manufacturing companies and 11 per cent of the non-manufacturing companies reported using a formula method which poses the question of how consistent are the valuation methods of the others.

The report contains a commentary on the way in which stock and work in progress figures are presented in published accounts, on changes in the methods of valuation over the past ten years, of the notice taken of the effects of currency depreciation, on the treatment of profits or losses on long-term contracts, on the carry-forward of deferred expenditure and on the use of the FIFO, LIFO and other conventions used in computing cost.

Disturbed by the prospect of what it calls 'the basic flaw in the presentation of recorded profits' continuing, the committee proposes that the normal method of valuing stock should be on the basis of a generally accepted 'planned cost' for each unit, this in brief being the planned total costs - excluding only unallocated costs - divided by the units produced. It is envisaged that the published accounts of a company would then disclose, presumably by way of a note, how much the valuation of stocks (if calculated by other methods) represented in these accounts differed from the 'planned cost' method of valuation. So as to indicate what 'planned cost' means, the accounts would also give an analysis of total costs (sales less profits) among materials, allocated costs and unallocated costs.

The study may be regarded as complementing the International Study Group report which is the subject of a leading article in this issue.

Exporting Capital Projects

THE most striking section of the White Paper on Export Business from Capital Projects Overseas (Cmnd 3516, H.M.S.O. 3s 3d) is undoubtedly the preface. The author, Lord Cromer, former Governor of the Bank of England, observes that 'the philosophy lying behind such business and the motives for undertaking such enterprise' are directly related to the need for incentives, i.e. 'greater profit commensurate to the greater risks involved in foreign business'. In the absence of change, Lord Cromer states that it would be 'unrealistic to anticipate anything other than a worsening of our relative performance in the world of the future in comparison with foreign competitors operating in more favourable conditions'.

The report is based upon the information received from the hundred or so firms approached, as well as from the Government departments involved in dealing with the export of large capital projects involving power generation, telecommunications, civil engineering, etc. It is noteworthy that the firms concerned welcomed the inquiry as evidence of the Government's interest in their problems and gave Lord Cromer every assistance and co-operation.

Among its recommendations the report does not consider it either appropriate or practical for the Government to provide assistance to meet the costs of tendering for projects. These are extremely heavy; costs of abortive tenders may reach $\int_{\frac{1}{2}}^{\frac{1}{2}}$ million. It would be more effective, states the report, to have some collaboration between the interested firms and industries concerned. Such co-operation would keep costs down and also offer the prospective client a joint service. On the subject of the trend towards consortia, the report considers that ad hoc combinations of firms would be 'generally more competitive and adaptable than a semi-permanent consortium which suffers from a number of disadvantages'.

Among the interests consulted by the author were the nationalized industries. As major customers of the industries concerned, Lord Cromer believes that their wealth of experience in the technical field would be of great value to firms making such tenders and should be made available on these occasions, even on a commercial basis. In addition, the Board of Trade should establish an 'Overseas Projects Group' to co-ordinate the diverse governmental activities bearing on industry's approach to overseas projects. Mr Anthony Crosland, President of the Board of Trade, has announced the adoption of this recommendation. Such groups could collate all the information about the projects, as well as potential foreign competition. At the same time the present financial arrangements to support feasibility surveys by consultants should be reconsidered.

Industrial Expansion Bill

FOLLOWING on the White Paper discussed in last week's issue, the Government has now laid before Parliament its long-awaited Industrial Expansion Bill. It contains seventeen clauses and four schedules.

In its essentials the Bill is concerned primarily to give Ministers powers to provide financial support for any industrial projects likely to benefit the national economy, but which would not be undertaken without Government assistance. Any scheme which merits assistance must be approved by the Treasury after its presentation by the Minister concerned. It will then be laid before Parliament.

The schemes need not relate to specific projects; they may be of a general nature, covering either an entire class, or classes of similar projects, or a section of an industry. Where a general scheme is proposed, the Bill provides for the establishment of a board for the industry concerned. Clause 3 gives such a board statutory powers to appoint members and staff as well as providing the funds for their remuneration. Clause 5 enables the Minister of Technology to appoint and remunerate an advisory committee to advise him and undertake any investigations which the Committee considers necessary.

Quite apart from the question as to whether or not the same objectives could not be achieved under existing legislation, it is difficult to see just how and in what ways the Government believes that its present proposals are likely to help the economy significantly. When one takes into account the strong objections of the industrial interests to this Bill, the net benefit for the Government which now, more than ever, requires the confidence of industrialists in its policies, seems somewhat slight. It is difficult to resist the conclusion that the Bill will prove to be more successful in proliferating committees at the public's expense than in resolving the basic problems of the national economy.

Institute's Business Game for Sixth Formers

OARD meetings' of sixth formers in twenty-Beeven schools were held this week at the start of the first heat of a computer-based business management game sponsored by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales in co-operation with I.C.T. Ltd.

The game began on Monday with the sixth formers making decisions on life-like company models. These decisions will be fed into an I.C.T. computer and the interaction and progress of the school 'companies' will be shown on computer print-offs.

The first heat involves six board meetings and will end on February 16th. Nine winning teams will then go on to the second heat which ends on March 22nd and the three teams in the finals will play off the last game in London in early summer. The winning team in each heat will be the one whose company earns the highest income.

The school boards are working from material which closely approximates the actual figures a company would expect from its accounts department. These include orders received, marketing expenditure, stock, plant, research and development, and unit costs. Each board has members representing the managing director, financial director, marketing director and production director. Institute adjudicators will be making reports to the boards at the end of the heats.

The winners will receive prizes from the Institute, which is sponsoring the game both to aid teachers of business study courses in reflecting the real world of business, and to interest sixth formers in the intellectual challenge which business provides. The teams participating include girls and boys from public. grammar and comprehensive schools throughout England and in Wales.

Farming and Capital Gains

HILE the introduction of the short-term capital gains tax in 1962 and the revised version in 1965 may have been justified in the light of the extensive profits made in land and share dealing, it was inevitable that such a tax would have some adverse side-effects. One hitherto neglected aspect of this subject is discussed in a report from the Department of Agricultural Economics at the University of Reading. This wellwritten and sensibly argued report entitled Capital Taxation and Land Ownership in England and Wales (price 7s 6d) was sponsored by the Country Land Owners' Association, but no one could accuse the three authors of prejudging their case.

As a result of the capital gains tax the authors believe that 'fragmentation of ownership in order to increase the benefits of exemption from the tax at time of retirement or of reduced rate taxation on gains under £5,000' is to be expected. At best, such a development will retard the amalgamation of farms which the Government is anxious to encourage on grounds of efficiency and, at worst, will affect the smaller farmers

The authors contend that companies will be worse off than individuals under the existing tax. Not merely do corporate gains attract the full rate of corporation tax, but to the extent that some part of the realized gain will be reflected in an appreciation of the share price, will also attract tax at the 30 per cent rate applicable to individuals. This, assert the authors, is to be regretted since in favour of the corporate farming business is the fact that the possibilities of savings to meet the cost of capital developments are greater.

This is an interesting report and it is to be hoped that the authors may be able to extend their researches to considering the combined effects of the present estate duty and the capital gains tax on farming land.

UR pension scheme is based partly on annual contributions made by the company as a percentage of total payroll, including both salaries and wages, and partly on contributions made by the staff. The latter are deducted from the employees' paychecks on authorization by formal mandates, and are handed over to the scheme's trustees. As one of the trustees I am responsible for the investment of the

It's a pleasant exercise to value the investment portfolio half-yearly and to watch the total sum increase. Stock Exchange values have escalated handsomely over the years, keeping pace with the dwindling value of mere money and our pensioners can sleep sound o' nights as a result. Equally important is the fact that those of us who will one day become pensioners in our turn can also rest content.

Of course, investments in the short term have taken some nasty knocks. Some years ago we had a shock in this context. It happened in the company's sphere of operations, not in the pension scheme's, but it taught us a salutary lesson in caution.

The beginning was a complaint by our surly deputychairman to the effect that as a company we were 'missing the boat'. There were easy fortunes to be made by speculation in stocks and shares, he declared. All sorts of damn stupid chaps regularly boasted to him in the club how well they'd done, 'bulling' and 'bearing' and so on. If those clots could make fat profits by just studying form, without doing a hand's turn of work, then why couldn't we do the same? He scowled at me as if it was my fault.

I explained that we were already paying interest on a fat overdraft to finance our trading activities, which showed a gross profit of over 20 per cent. That seemed a good safe return on investment. But the other directors disagreed. Good and safe it might be, but it wasn't good enough if we could do better. How about voting £50,000 to a 'quoted securities budget' and playing the market?

Well, our articles of association gave us power to invest and to deal in securities, as our solicitor confirmed, so we investigated further. Our stockbroker produced an impressive list of names likely to give either attractive net yields or capital appreciation, or conceivably both. Our auditors said cautiously that the profits would probably be subject to tax one way or the other. Our bankers smiled acquiescently. We took a deep breath and boldly took the plunge.

At first everything, to pursue the metaphor, went swimmingly. We adopted a policy of selling quickly when our shares rose a few shillings, on the grounds that you can't go wrong by taking a profit, and of getting out equally fast if any particular holding looked shaky. We did better - substantially better than break-even and the deputy-chairman inquired smugly and often where we'd be without him.

Then somehow the sky darkened. Our share values faltered and fell, the bankers suddenly spoke of credit squeezes leading to reduced commitments, and the auditors muttered gloomily of diminishing net worth ratios. A couple of disgruntled shareholders asked some irritating questions at the annual general meeting and the directors lost confidence. We liquidated our portfolio over two years at a capital loss, small but unpleasant, each year.

The shock I mentioned came when the Inland Revenue refused at first to treat the loss as a trading loss. We were speculating, not trading, they claimed; they couldn't accept a retail drapery firm like ours as a dealer in stocks and shares within the meaning of the Act. There was consternation in the boardroom, but fortunately our auditors dug their heels in and refused bluntly to yield on a point of law.

Fortunately a somewhat similar case (Lewis Emanuel v. White) was decided in the taxpayer's favour in 1965, so a favourable precedent was established. Since then we've always based policy on studies showing the worst, as well as the best, possible results as alternatives.

Financial Planning with a Corporate Financial Model

by A. S. JACKSON, F.C.A., A.A.C.C.A., G. G. STEPHENSON, M.Sc., and E. C. TOWNSEND, B.A.(Econ.), Ph.D.

THE post-war era has seen quite striking advances in management techniques, which have arisen in response to equally striking changes in the nature of the industrial enterprise. Perhaps the most critical characteristic of modern industry is the ever-lengthening time-horizon involved in the commitment of funds to the productive activity. As Professor J. K. Galbraith argued in the 1966 Reith Lectures, this increasing commitment necessarily extends the consequences of current decisions far into the future and the result is the undeniable necessity for some form of planning.

The planning function is complicated by the realization that managerial decisions cannot be made in isolation. In judging an issue it is necessary to examine the full corporate consequences of the postulated action, but the complexity with which individual activities are interrelated makes this task a difficult one.

A number of the larger companies in the United Kingdom have turned to the computer for help in handling such problems. In this series of four articles the authors describe a study they carried out within the Heavy Organic Chemicals Division of I.C.I. Ltd, using a medium-sized computer to simulate the finances of a company. The subject-matter dealt with in the four successive articles is as follows:

- I Building the model.
- II The methodology of financial planning.
- III Examining alternative strategies.
- IV Evaluation of a strategic choice the National Economic Development Council case.

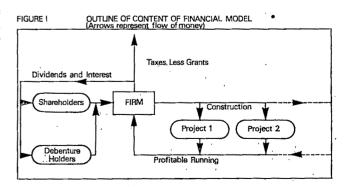

The company comprises a number of complicated internal monetary systems and itself forms part of a larger monetary system. The model synthesizes the internal monetary systems in an attempt to obtain a greater insight into the financial operations of the company.

I - Building the Model

The construction of a model in the present context involves the representation of the finances of a company by means of a system of equations. The variables appearing in these equations will represent such items as the company's annual expenditures on plant and machinery, its annual corporation tax liability, its dividend payments to the shareholders, and so on. The equations represent the relationships between these variables. Thus the company's retained earnings for a given year would be defined as the profit remaining after payment of taxes, less dividends paid to shareholders.

The representation of the finances of even a small company is clearly a problem of enormous complexity. It is, therefore, necessary for the model to express only a simplified form of the true situation. Nevertheless, it will be necessary to include sufficient detail to ensure that the results obtained are of sufficient accuracy to be valuable for guiding future decisions. The aim, then, should be for an admittedly imperfect description, but one which is adequate to predict financial performance to within an acceptable level of accuracy over a wide range of financial conditions. Fig. I shows diagrammatically the range of considerations which are included in the financial model discussed below.

The amount of detail required in such a model may be illustrated by a particular example of its use. 'Gearing' is the ratio of money raised from fixed interest

A. S. Jackson and G. G. Stephenson are respectively accountant and operational research manager in the Central Investigation Group of the H.O.C. Division of I.C.I. Ltd. Dr Townsend was formerly economist in the group and has since moved to the School of Business Studies, University of Liverpool.

THE ACCOUNTANT

sources to the total of funds employed. In practice, the company's level of gearing is limited and in the majority of cases this limit is set by reference to the nominal value of the issued share capital. The company will usually be empowered to capitalize its reserves, and reserves are the result of past profitability. The model must therefore be able to simulate the behaviour of a financial planner who:

- (a) is constrained by an existing legal maximum in his ability to raise fixed interest finance;
- (b) has already engineered a certain level of gearing within the permitted limits;
- (c) has confidence about future profitability; and
- (d) is required to obtain funds to finance the planned objectives.

Components of the model

The model comprises those features of a company which are important to its overall performance. They have been shown diagrammatically in Fig. I and may be listed as follows:

- (1) Investment profitability.
- (2) Future growth.
- (3) Investment characteristics.
- (4) Levels of permissible gearing.
- (5) Dividend policy.
- (6) The use of surplus cash resources.
- (7) The levels of corporation tax and investment grants.

1. Investment profitability

The most important feature of an asset is its profitability as an investment. The model will need to explore in depth the results of differing profitability levels. This is complicated when there is a varying return on the asset between its early and late years of operation. This variation can be depicted as an income profile, as in Fig. II.

The model presented here uses the same profile for all investments. (In practice this is not necessary but is a convenient simplification for the purposes of illustration)

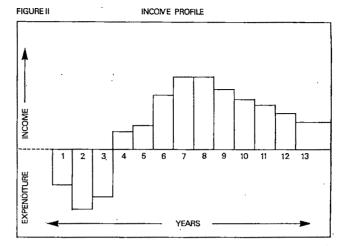

Profitability can be set to any desired level by using a scaling factor.

2. Future growth

Growth is simulated in the model by allowing a firm to commit its future profitability by accepting new projects. The firm is mortgaging future profitability and has to make up any cash shortage by obtaining new money from its shareholders and debenture-holders.

The rate of growth is taken to mean the cumulative rate of increase, through time, of a company's stock of productive assets, valued at cost. Investment grants will be held on the liabilities side of the balance sheet.

The model takes a specified growth and calculates company performance from it. Growth may be steady or non-steady. It may even be a negative amount to represent a declining company.

3. Investment characteristics

An investment (asset) has five essential features in addition to profitability mentioned above. These are:

- (a) The expected life of the investment, divided into expired life and future life.
- (b) Depreciation policy, i.e. how the investment is to be amortized over its expected life.
- (c) The time that is taken to build or erect an asset.
- (d) The rates of capital spending during the time in (c).
- (e) The proportion of company investment that consists of working capital.

In the model, value musts be assigned to these features.

4. Level of permissible gearing

The model requires the level of gearing to be specified. In the event of investment profitability being insufficient to finance the growth rate, the modelled company must re-finance itself with debt capital first and then share capital.

As these operations are simulating the issue of a prospectus, a limit must be imposed on the frequency with which the modelled company may go to the market for new funds.

5. Dividend policy

To calculate and pay dividends the model requires a series of decision rules for three eventualities:

- (a) a starting-point from which to calculate, e.g. the previous year's dividend;
- (b) a policy where company profits, after tax, show a rising trend;
- (c) a policy where the trend is falling.

106

The model must not be allowed to pay dividends out of capital.

6. The use of surplus cash resources

If the growth rate is insufficient to utilize all the cash being generated from investment profitability, idle cash would build up in the company's bank account. The model must know how to deal with this possibility, e.g. invest in Treasury Bills or in the equity of other companies. Alternatively, the model may be required to maintain a certain level of liquidity.

7. The levels of corporation tax and investment grants Regulations for the assessment and payment of corporation tax, investment grants and depreciation allowances must also be included.

Construction of the model from its components

Two approaches may be adopted in constructing a computer model of a company's finances. Both involve the representation of the physical or monetary features of the company by variables, and in both cases the relationships between the variables will be expressed in the form of equations. The choice of approach to be adopted – i.e. budgetary model or simulation model – will depend on which variables the model is evaluating for us and which variables are to be presented to the model as data.

Budgetary models

A budgetary model attempts to answer questions of the type 'If the company is to attain a given size (or level of profitability etc.) in five years' time, what requirements does this put on our activities during this period?' In this case the budgetary model tends to work backwards as compared with time. The budgetary approach is extremely valuable in helping to assess the logistic consequences incurred in the selection of particular goals.

It would, therefore, be the appropriate form of model for use in planning resource requirements (e.g. manpower planning). Conversely, the budgetary form is not normally suitable for strategic planning where the problem is to select a best strategy from a set of possible alternatives. Since the objective in building the model under discussion is concerned with selection of financial strategies, the budgetary form of model has not been adopted.

Simulation models

The alternative form of model for planning purposes is the simulation model, in which the computer is presented with a number of rules for action together with the company's present circumstances and is required to simulate the company's progress into the future.

Since companies are restricted in their freedom of action by external circumstances, the legal environment, the influence of the capital market, and so on, the simulation approach to the construction of a planning model is the appropriate one. In constructing a financial planning model of a company, the simulation approach was used.¹

Data for the model

The data for the model begins with information about the current stock of assets owned by the company. This is the company's 'inheritance' from the past and forms the starting-point for future actions. It is followed by information about the tax system, including the rates of investment incentives available, and about other external influences, such as the rates of interest payable on debt capital.

The final data required by the model is concerned with the internal characteristics of the company. This data will include the time taken to build or erect an asset, the profile of income which will be obtained from the typical investment and the requirements for working capital. Further information will be required about depreciation policy, dividend policy, and the use of cash resources. The data further stipulates the rate at which the company is to grow.

Output from the model

It is important that the output from the model should be in a form which is comprehensible to those managers who are responsible for the financial planning activity. The results from the model should include the following information.

1. Investment cash flow

For the sake of simplicity all investments in the model are assumed to have identical characteristics, except in respect of their size. The first results from the model show the cash flows generated by the typical investment both before and after tax, and state the discounted cash flow return for the project, again both before and after taking tax and investment incentives into account.

2. Summary of data

It is convenient for the computer to print out the basic data upon which it is operating at any one time in order to avoid confusion in analysing the results. For each run of the model a table should be printed giving details of the dividend rules being used, the deprecia-

¹ Readers who are familiar with the literature of operational research may find this terminology somewhat confusing. The term 'simulation' is used here in its widest sense and should not be taken to infer that the model being described uses the technique of Monte Carlo simulation. Nevertheless, while the model deals only with situations of assumed certainty of outcome, extensions to include uncertainty could be made using Monte Carlo techniques.

I.C.T. Coosthe cost of Hot-line computing

New 1900 Series developments give direct-access for less than £50,000; a real-time system for around £130,000; four additional processors

Until now, only the Big Boys have been able to dive straight into a computer at a moment's notice and get information instantly. Because this direct-access capability has been expensive. Not any more. The smallest of the new computers (the 1901A) provides direct-access for less than £50,000. And this includes Cobol and Fortran.

£50,000 is a remarkably low price for direct-access capability. It means that new computer users can start with all its advantages in terms of speed and flexibility—and then can build up easily to larger real-time systems.

A logical development

By adding four new models—1901A, 1902A, 1903A, 1904A—I.C.T. has taken the development of the 1900 Series another step forward. These new, powerful processors are fully compatible with each other and with existing 1900 Series processors. And use existing 1900 Series peripherals and software.

They are suitable for commercial and scientific applications. They use the latest type of integrated circuit—designed specifically for computers. They offer multi-access; multi-programming; increased peripheral handling; the most advanced operating systems. And much more. So you get greater power, greater sophistication at less cost than ever before.

3. Annual accounts

The model simulates the financial consequences of following a particular course of action (a 'financial strategy') over the planning period, which might be (say) ten years. The model contains sufficient data for the computer to produce a series of annual accounts, including balance sheets, profit and loss accounts, and cash statements. Certain financial ratios, such as return on capital employed and return on net assets, can also be calculated.

Bank Money Transfer Services

from The Banking Information Service

OR about 300 years the cheque and, to a lesser extent, the bill of exchange have been used by businesses and individuals to settle debts. But in the present age of hire-purchase, insurance premiums, mortgage payments and credit accounts, more sophisticated means of money transfer are necessary. In recognition of this need the banks, who have cooperated to provide money transfer by cheque since the days when the early bankers used a London coffeehouse for the exchange or 'clearing' of each other's cheques, introduced in 1961 the credit transfer service. Among its many uses, that of a simple and convenient way of paying salaries and wages direct to bank accounts quickly established the credit transfer. Not without reason its use has increased by more than 100 per cent in the past five years.

As noted in The Accountant of November 11th (page 615) the banks have now introduced a further money transfer service — direct debiting. Together, credit transfers and direct debiting offer bank customers a complete money transfer service to which the banks have given the short and convenient name 'Bank Giro'. It is an appropriate name, too, for the word 'giro', derived from the Greek guros meaning a circuit or turn, is used extensively on the Continent to describe the circulation of money.

Streamlining of the banks' money transfer services is already being carried out by the increasing use of computers. The next five years should see some remarkable advances which for customers will mean savings in time and cost, and an even greater range of services.

Direct debiting

The new direct debit is a reversal of the familiar standing order – popularly known as the banker's order. Whereas the standing order is a simple instruction by a customer to his bank to make fixed, regular payments to the recipient's bank, the direct debit is originated by the creditor and can be used to transfer varying amounts at varying intervals. For example, the wholesaler who regularly supplies many retail customers and normally receives payment by cheque or credit transfer can simplify his accounting by using direct debiting. With the prior approval of his customers he can arrange, through his own bank, for the bank account of each to be debited with the value of the invoice and his own account credited. The entry will be passed after an agreed interval so that any invoice may be checked and, if necessary, queried.

For the wholesaler this system has distinct advantages: he controls the transfer slip; he will know quickly of any unpaid amount as the transfer form will be returned to him; he is saved the task of sending statements or reminders as no customer can overlook paying his account. For the retailer, there is no longer the need to send off a cheque or credit transfer in settlement and no chance of losing a discount by overlooking payment.

The personal customer, too, stands to benefit from the new scheme. Many of those periodic bills which now have to be paid by cheque or credit transfer may in the future be settled by the simpler direct debit.

Banks' new computer services

Until now developments in money transfer systems have meant adding to the vast flow of paper vouchers which move round the financial system. In 1968 the banks will take the first step towards stemming this flow with the setting-up of an inter-bank computer bureau for the exchange of magnetic tape between banks, and between banks and their customers. The tapes of standard type, will be acceptable to a vast range of computers and will record details of transactions passing from bank to customer, and customer to bank.

Initially, three important services will be available to

the customer using a computer. First, customers who make a large number of payments, including salary and wage payments, by bank giro credit (credit transfer) will be able to supply their banks with information on magnetic tape instead of using paper vouchers. Second, businesses will be able to supply their banks with tape records of payments for which claims are being made under the direct debiting system. Only one tape is necessary, no matter how many different banks and branches are involved. Third, firms issuing large numbers of cheques will be able to obtain a tape record of those cheques which have been debited to their

Many other developments are envisaged in this great computer expansion. A revolution in the book-keeping systems of both banks and their customers will undoubtedly take place during the next few years. As the banks move towards more advanced systems it is possible to visualize the transfer of accounting data from customers' computers directly to those at the inter-bank bureau. The companies that will benefit most from these developments, not least the elimination of the greater part of the paper work, will be those which, at the earliest opportunity, link their own book-keeping procedures with those of their banks.

Other developments

Seven years' experience of credit transfers has enabled the banks to introduce several refinements. While not as far-reaching as direct debiting or the inter-bank computer bureau, these refinements are none the less significant. Earlier this year the charge for credit transfers passing ordinarily from one account to another was abolished. This move, coupled with the low cost of 6d for transfers made on behalf of people without bank accounts, makes bank channels more than competitive with alternative means of money transfer.

More customers are now able to make use of the banks' 'collection account' facilities. The firm or company that receives many payments by bank giro credit can be sent a machine listing of each day's credits direct from its bank's head office or main London office. In this way notice of payment is received a day earlier, though crediting to the concern's account takes place as usual.

Within certain necessary limitations customers can design their own bank giro credit forms so that discounts, special messages, reference numbers and other information can be incorporated. Direct debit forms can also be designed to suit customers' individual requirements.

The banks and the G.P.O. Giro

The developments in the banks' services are not without relevance to the coming competition from another giro – the Post Office Giro. Any innovation likely to draw money from bank accounts to the Post Office is the concern of the banks. Some efflux is expected but there are grounds for thinking it will not be great.

There is no substitute for a bank account. It offers far more than efficient methods of transferring money; it is on the spot, at the local branch of one's choice and immediately accessible. The money in the account can be withdrawn or otherwise deployed without delay. Moreover, the banks have a range of services no other organization can offer — overseas business, advice for exporters, executor and trustee services, investment management, and many more — and the key to these services is the personal advice of the bank manager. Experienced both in banking matters and in business generally, he is ready to give customers the benefit of that experience.

Of all the banks' services, the facility for borrowing money (not possible with the Post Office Giro) by overdraft or loan is perhaps the most important to many customers. So far as businesses are concerned, unproductive balances in the Post Office Giro or elsewhere are not an economic proposition, particularly if a company operates its bank account in overdraft from time to time; it will be naturally anxious to keep its borrowing at the lowest possible level.

The inclination to transfer Post Office Giro balances is likely to be strengthened by the fact that bank managers can scarcely be expected to view with much favour the idea of granting or renewing an overdraft so that a customer can keep a credit balance in the Post Office Giro. This would be neither a particularly attractive form of lending nor, so long as priorities have to be enforced, one that would qualify for preferential treatment.

Co-operation - and competition

Although inter-bank co-operation is essential to the successful operation of the money transfer services, in providing their many other services the banks compete keenly. This competition is obviously to the advantage of customers, particularly in the sphere of charges which are – as the Prices and Incomes Board found – most reasonable.

It might be appropriate to add a word or two about the role of the cheque in the future, for the developments in money transfer systems are tending to reduce or even eliminate the need for cheques. The banks recognize that the cheque will continue to play an important part in money transfer, particularly for the personal customer. By investing in automated cheque handling machinery they are able to cope efficiently with the 3½ million cheques paid into United Kingdom banks each working day; by introducing the cheque card and extending the facilities for encashment at any branch they have added to the value and usefulness of cheques.

The British banking system is the most highly developed in the world. Its services are tried and tested to the extent that they have a built-in flexibility. The banks believe that it is this flexibility that enables a customer, through his bank, to make the most profitable use of his money.

The Tax Code of a Developing Country – Malaysia

by L. A. VARTY

Lately Comptroller-General, Inland Revenue, Malaysia

ANY of the problems referred to in this paper will apply equally to any developing country or any excolonial territory. Clearly the change from dependence to independence and self-government creates a host of problems which the government of the new country must solve. Not least of these is the need for finance and increased revenue. It is not the purpose of this paper to discuss the political or wide variety of domestic problems, but to confine comment to problems in the tax field.

In this context Malaysia has had more than average problems because, in its formation, the tax codes of the Malay Peninsula and those of the two Borneo territories of Sabah and Sarawak were quite different. The fundamental differences will be examined against the background of producing a unified Income Tax Act which will apply to Malaysia as a whole.

Basic facts

Before discussing the tax code of any country it is, of course, essential to know at least the basic facts of its history and development, its climate and geography, its racial origins, industry, products, communications and the like.

Malaysia was formed on September 16th, 1963, by the amalgamation or union of four territories. On the mainland the two territories comprised the States of Malaya and the State of Singapore. Across the South China Sea in the island of Borneo lay the other two; Sabah and Sarawak. The union formed one country of some one hundred and thirty thousand square miles which became Malaysia, and for convenience of reference the mainland territory is referred to as West Malaysia and the Borneo territories as East Malaysia.

In August 1965 Singapore left Malaysia to become a separate and independent State with its own Government. The consideration of the tax code will therefore be limited to the three components of Malaysia, viz. the States of Malaya, Sabah and Sarawak.

The racial origins of the peoples of Malaysia derive in the main from three sources:

Malays who form some 42 per cent. Chinese who form about 38 per cent. Indians who form about 10 per cent.

Of the main races (in terms of population) there are Land and Sea Dyaks, Melanau, Dusun, Munit and Bajau. There are, of course, also quite a considerable number of Eurasians and Europeans in the community.

The total population is about nine million, and it is well worth noting that there are a high proportion of young people under 21 so that there is a very adequate labour force.

The country lies between $1\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$ and 7° north of the Equator and as one might expect it is tropical with a day temperature varying between 80° and 95° Farenheit and the nights about 5° cooler. Rainfall averages one hundred inches a year. Clearly, therefore, plant life flourishes and although the Government is doing everything to encourage the spread of agriculture, clearing of the jungle which covers 75 per cent of the country will take time and cost money for the territory is extremely mountainous with mountains of up to 13,500 feet.

Trade and travel

The principal products of Malaysia are well known, namely, tin, rubber, iron, palm oil, timber, pepper, hemp, tropical fruits (especially the canned pineapple), coal and copra. There are others of which copper, gold, bauxite, sago are but a few. Exploration for oil is taking place off the coast of the mainland and elsewhere since oil is already known to exist in Brunei and Sarawak.

Communications in the west coastal plain of the mainland are excellent, whether by road, rail, sea or air. Sea and air services, indeed, are excellent throughout the whole of Malaysia. In East Malaysia, however, a great deal of development of road communications is needed and within the limit of the finances available the Government is doing all it can. Australia is giving assistance in this direction under the Colombo Plan. Government schemes coupled with fiscal incentives are being brought into being to encourage industrialization and investment both by residents and overseas industrialists but there is, of course, still ample opportunity for further investment.

Politically this is a democratic country with full political freedom. Education has made good strides in the last few years although, of course, much remains to be done. A great deal of useful aid, not only financial but in the shape of technical assistance, is being given by the Colombo Plan countries, the United Naticns and voluntary organizations. There is every reason to believe that Malaysia has an assured future in the world of commerce and in the Commonwealth of Nations.

Consideration of the Malaysian tax code may, like Gaul, be divided into three parts:

- (1) The colonial era (up to 1963).
- (2) The transitional period (1963-68).
- (3) The future.

Colonial period

The colonial period strictly extends only to August 1957, for the States of Malaya achieved self-government on that date, but in the tax field there were few changes prior to 1963. The territories concerned had been governed by the United Kingdom for more than one hundred and fifty years before 1957, but taxation in the more sophisticated Western form was unknown before 1941 when estate duty was introduced.

A paper presented at a meeting of the British branch of the International Fiscal Association in November.

On January 1st, 1948, income tax was introduced into the States of Malaya by the Income Tax Ordinance of 1947. The Income Tax Ordinance of 1956 brought income tax into being in Sabah and, finally, on January 1st, 1961, direct taxation in its present form was introduced into Sarawak by the Inland Revenue Ordinance 1960 of Sarawak.

The Pioneer Industries (Relief from Income Tax) Ordinances also introduced relief for pioneer companies into the three territories at about the same time although there were certain fundamental differences between the treatment of pioneer companies in each territory. As one would expect the income tax ordinances of each component of Malaysia were different in many respects for they had grown up from the needs of each particular territory before amalgamation. It is now proposed to touch on the main differences so that some of the problems of unification can be appreciated.

In scope, the States of Malaya looked only to the taxing of income derived from sources within these States and also in the case of a resident, to tax remittances made to Malaya. Broadly speaking, therefore, the scope was on a derivation basis.

In Sabah and Sarawak, the scope was similarly on a derivation basis for each territory but with one major difference in the case of a person resident in either territory. In such an event that person's chargeable income, wherever it arose in the world, was deemed to be derived from Sabah or Sarawak as the case may be. Thus it will be appreciated that world income scope applied in Sabah or Sarawak to all resident persons.

The basis period in the States of Malaya was broadly speaking similar to that of the United Kingdom in so far as it applies to individuals. (There is no corporation tax in Malaysia.) Generally speaking (with one or two minor exceptions income from employments, businesses, etc., is taxed using the income of the previous year as a measure. There are commencement and cessation provisions similar to those in the United Kingdom but without the penultimate year cessation refinement. The fiscal year for all persons is the same as the calendar year.

Where the proprietor of a business elects, he may be taxed on the basis of the accounts year ended in the preceding year but this election, once made, cannot be changed except with the agreement of the Comptroller.

Similar provisions as to businesses apply in Sabah and Sarawak but the basis periods are different. In Sabah the preceding year basis applies but without commencement or cessation; moreover for persons other than companies the fiscal year ends on June 30th. For companies the fiscal year ends December 31st. In Sarawak there are different basis periods for different sources, and perhaps it should here be explained that the Sarawak ordinance is modelled on the Hong Kong ordinance and has no income tax as such (but inland revenue only). It is divided into four main charging parts:

- (i) property tax (not at present in force);
- (ii) salaries tax (on employment, tips, etc.);
- (iii) business profits tax;
- (iv) interest tax.

The scope of each part differs. Salaries tax is based on the current year's income (to December 31st). Business profits tax is measured by reference to the income of the preceding year (with no commencement or cessation). Interest tax is on a current year basis and levied at a flat 5 per cent. It is a noteworthy point that except in the case of profits of business, where all income is deemed to be business income, unless income is salary or interest it is not taxable under this ordinance.

The taxable income in Sabah and the States of Malaya is charged to scale rates up to a maximum of 50 per cent. In Sarawak, as already indicated, interest is only charged at 5 per cent and other income at scale rates. There is, however, an abatement of income tax in Sabah and Sarawak in the case of individuals, where income is charged at less than the 50 per cent rate.

Transition period

With the advent of Malaysia it was clearly essential to increase revenue yield to speed up development. In addition, it was equally necessary to think about producing a unified Income Tax Act for Malaysia. Before this could be done, however, a harmonization of taxes programme was necessary. So, during 1963, 1964 and 1965, amendments were made to bring rates of tax, personal allowances and procedures in the three components into line as a preparatory to a unified Act. At the same time, in 1964, preliminary discussions were held by senior Inland Revenue officials on the unified Act and these continued in 1965. By the end of 1965 policy points had been thoroughly considered by these officers who then made their recommendations to the Minister of Finance and through him to the Cabinet.

Early in 1966 the Cabinet laid down policy on the new Act and the work of drafting this major legislation was commenced. The first draft was produced in January 1967 and after several revisions the first public edition of the draft Bill was published in mid-1967. It became law on January 1st, 1968, when the other ordinances ceased to have effect except for transitional provisions.

In scope, residents will, as in the United Kingdom, be taxed on world income. This will, of course, give rise to many more cases of doubly taxed income and therefore a need for more double taxation agreements. The basis period is the preceding year throughout, for all income. There are no commencement or cessation provisions. Business may continue to elect to be assessed on the basis of the accounts year ended in the preceding year. There are changes of accounting date provisions, a tightening up in the legal avoidance and penalty field and a general improvement, it is hoped, in appeals, procedure and administrative provisions. An attempt has been made, as far as possible, to spell out the tax position in each given situation so that less reference to case law will be necessary.

The immediate need to increase revenue yield gave rise to the introduction of four new taxes as from January 1st, 1965 and in addition, a capital gains tax was written but not introduced. The new taxes were payroll tax, turnover tax, tin profits tax and cinematograph film hire duty. Payroll tax was levied monthly at 2 per cent on the payroll. Exemption was given where the monthly payroll was less than $500 (about £60). Government and quasi-government bodies were also exempt and the Minister of Finance was given power to exempt other classes of persons (e.g. religious bodies).

'Turnover tax

Turnover tax was introduced as a multi-stage tax at $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. There were wide exemptions for primary commodities (tin, rubber producers, etc.) and exports. In addition many classes of person were exempted. There was also a general exemption where turnover was below a certain level. The multi-stage tax caused considerable price increases, largely because goods passed through many hands and much more than $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent was added. It will be appreciated that one cannot add $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of a dollar and, in fact, some traders added five cents (or 5 per cent) to the price of all goods. As a result of representations in 1965 the turnover tax in 1966 became a single stage tax at 2 per cent levied on the sale of imported goods.

The turnover tax was repealed at the end of 1966 and replaced by a 2 per cent customs surcharge. Tin profits tax was written as an additional (or excess) income tax. There had been a fortuitous increase in tin prices in 1964 and this tax at 10 per cent sought to charge the surplus profits being made. A standard was laid down and any excess over that standard was charged. Exemption was granted where profits were less than $10,000.

Cinematograph film hire duty was levied on gross receipts from renting films. The receipts were abated by 40 per cent (to represent expenses) and the balance of 60 per cent was charged at 25 per cent. In effect, therefore, this charged receipts at 15 per cent tax.

Development tax

In 1966, apart from the charges to turnover tax and other harmonization work, a new 'development tax' was introduced. This was, in effect, an additional income tax levied at 5 per cent on business profits and also income from property. There was also a minimum charge for companies, partnerships and individuals irrespective of whether or not a loss was made. In addition petroleum income tax legislation was written for the day when oil is discovered in Malaysia

These measures coupled with an effective drive against tax evasion (started in 1966) gave a considerable boost to the Malaysian revenue and helped the Government to continue with its development programme.

The future

What of the future? This seems to be bright for a country which has a stable democratic Government, ample raw materials and labour, good roads, air services, railways and communication, and a will to expand and export.

Of course, in the tax field one must always maintain an efficient anti-tax evasion system, and this is working well in Malaysia.

In addition the Government has already given concessions and incentives to industry in the tax field and has indicated its willingness to increase incentives as the direction of its economic drive and industrialization becomes more clearly defined. Complex, sophisticated taxation has been avoided so that maximum use of the staff is possible.

At the same time one must expect that Malaysia, like any other developing country, is looking to the day when it will produce and manufacture much of its own consumer requirements. It will also be interested in building up its own export markets and this means more industrialization and investment and possibly higher tariffs for imported manufactured goods. The Government is anxious to encourage foreign as well as domestic investment in the country and to develop particularly in East Malaya and Sabah and Sarawak. It is hoped they will succeed in their efforts.

The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales

Higher Entry Standards - Declaration of Intent

THE Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales has announced to members that discussions have been taking place between the principal accountancy bodies on a variety of questions concerning the structure of the accountancy profession in the United Kingdom and its standards of entry, education and training. In relation to entry standards the Council considers that the objective should be to prescribe conditions equivalent to minimum university entrance requirements. This, in terms of the G.C.E. examination, would mean a standard including at least two passes at Advanced level in acceptable subjects or the defined equivalent in corresponding examinations.

The Council has concluded that, irrespective of any concerted action which may follow from the discussions with the other accountancy bodies, it is desirable for the Institute to raise its entry standards. Consequential bye-law alterations would be necessary. The Council has decided to put to members proposals for these bye-law alterations with intent that

- (a) for those who need to rely on passes gained in acceptable examinations held on or after September 30th, 1969, the minimum standard for the granting of a Preliminary Certificate shall be condition (A) set out in page 8 of A Summary of the Requirements for Membership, May 1967 edition; and that
- (b) those who had met the current lesser requirements at examinations held before September 30th, 1969, will be able as a transitional measure to apply for a Preliminary Certificate after that date.

Consideration is being given to introducing at or about the same time a form of junior qualification for those who, whilst not having attained the proposed higher standard, wish to pursue a career in accountancy.

In re Gartside's Will Trusts

(Before LORD REID, Lord MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST, Lord HODSON, Lord GUEST and LORD WILBERFORCE)

Estate duty – Shares of residue on discretionary trusts during son's life – Surplus income accumulated – After son's death capital and income for his children with remainders over – Power of advancement – Exercise in favour of two of son's children – Son dying shortly afterwards – Whether children had had interests in possession – Finance Act 1894, sections 1, 2 (1) (b), 7 – Finance Act 1940, section 43.

The testator made his will in 1934 and died in 1941. The will gave a one-fourth share of residue on discretionary trusts during his son's lifetime for applying the income wholly or partly as the trustees thought fit for the benefit of the son and his wife and children. After the son's death, the capital and income were to go to the son's children on attaining 21 or, being female, marrying under that age; and there were remainders over. Surplus income was to be accumulated during the son's life, to follow his one-fourth share, but resort could be had to the accumulations. In 1961, the net income was about £3,900 a year. In May 1961, £786 of income was paid under the discretionary trusts for the benefit of the testator's son, and in the next month £50 was similarly applied.

In 1962 the trustees exercised their power of advancement in favour of the testator's two grandsons, and the advancement was by the making of a settlement on each of them. In each settlement the amount advanced was a quarter of the son's quarter share of the trust fund, exclusive of accumulations. In the events which happened the grandsons became entitled under their settlements to demand the transfer of the sums advanced if they became 21. From the date of the advancement all the trust income was paid to the son. In January 1962, the accumulations came to more than £55,000, and the value of the son's quarter share was £93,700. In the same month the accumulations period ended, and in May 1963, the son died. At the date of his death the value of the advance to each grandson was £23,500. Estate duty was claimed on the son's death on each of the amounts advanced.

It was contended by the Revenue that under section 43 of the Finance Act 1940, an interest limited to cease on a death had been determined after becoming an interest in possession, in that each of the grandsons had had an interest in possession as a discretionary beneficiary. It was contended that 'interest in possession' in the section was any interest which related to current income; and alternatively that the right of the discretionary beneficiaries to have a proper exercise of the discretion as to income by the trustees was an interest related to current income, as was also the right of those interested in the accumulations to have the trustees accumulate current income subject to a proper exercise of their discretion.

Held (reversing the decision of the Court of Appeal): the objects of the discretionary trust did not have an interest in the advanced amounts before the date of the advancements; and that section 43 of the Finance Act 1940 was not applicable.

In re Holmden's Settlement

Estate duty – Settlement – Discretionary trust – Accumulation of surplus income – Variation of trust – Distribution of trust fund – Whether limited interest disposed of – Whether trust fund deemed to have passed on life-tenant's death – Finance Act 1894, sections 1, 2 (1) (b), 22 (1) (l) – Finance Act 1940, section 43.

By a settlement deed made in 1927 the trust income was payable during the joint lives of the settlor and his wife, on a discretionary trust for the settlor's wife and children and the children's issue, and any balance of income was to be accumulated. After the deaths of the settlor and his wife the income was to be applied for the children and their issue as the settlor's widow should appoint, and subject to any appointment half the income was to be paid to the settlor's son during his life, and afterwards half the capital was to be transferred to his children; and the other half of the income was to be paid to the settlor's daughter during her life, and afterwards her half of the capital was to be transferred to her children.

The settlor's wife survived him. The son had three children and the daughter two children. In 1960 an order was made varying the trusts of the settlement. The period of the discretionary trust of income during the life of the settlor's wife was extended for the duration of her life or the period of twenty-one years from the operative date of the order, whichever period should be the longer, and the wife's power of appointment was cancelled. After the end of the trust period the capital was to be divided among the son and the daughter of the settlor and their children. There was power for the trustees to declare the trust period at an end as regards part or the whole of the trust fund. In 1962 the settlor's wife died.

It was contended by the Inland Revenue that estate duty was payable on the death of the settlor's widow, and the contention was based on these arguments: (i) that the trust fund passed under section 1 of the Finance Act 1894, with the assistance of section 22 (1) (l) of that Act; (ii) that it passed under section 1 aided by section 2 (1) (b) and section 22 (1) (l); (iii) that the trust fund had to be deemed to have passed under section 43 of the Finance Act 1940. It was contended on behalf of the trustees (i) that there had been no determination of the life interest of the settlor's widow; (ii) that section 43 was not applicable to the determination of a discretionary trust.

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal): section 43 of the Finance Act 1940 was not applicable because (i) there had not been a determination or disposition of the life interest; (ii) alternatively, if there had been a determination or a disposition, it was not in favour of other persons

Reviews

A Guide to Taxation

by Oliver Stanley.

Methuen & Co Ltd, London. 30s.

The literature of taxation is not everyone's cup of poison but Mr Oliver Stanley, in his articles in the financial Press, consistently succeds in making what he writes attractive to expert and layman alike. Now he has ventured on a full-length book which holds the same compelling interest from beginning to end. He explains with gently ironic wit the many forms of taxation and how the Inland Revenue works. In discussing the men who make it work he is both kindly and critical:

'On the whole, it is wise to keep things simple for your Inspector. You may go to see him to get his measure, but if you make too many new problems for him you will disturb his routine, attract his attention, and quite unconsciously he will begin to create problems for you'.

In discussing the elaborate protocol of tax collection, he is good humouredly resigned:

'If you do fail to appeal within the time-limit, all is not quite lost. You can still register an appeal after thirty days if you can show "absence, sickness or other reasonable cause". . . . But to be reasonable, a cause must be of a nature similar to absence or sickness. To say you forgot all about the beastly thing is inadmissible'.

Throughout, Mr Stanley stresses that the whole taxation system of this country is unnecessarily cumbersome and arbitrary and that as long as it remains so the cut and thrust of tax avoidance duels will continue. He appeals for fewer and simpler rules so designed as to minimize the risk of ambiguity of interpretation. His next task should be to draft a new tax code which would give practical expression to this admirable philosophy. With his pellucid literary style and his vision (he left the Civil Service in 1965 because he felt it inexorably closing in upon him) he would start away ahead of most of his still blinkered ex-colleagues at Somerset House and the Treasury.

Encyclopedia of Betterment Levy and Land Commission Law and Practice

General Editor, Desmond Heap, LL.M.

Sweet & Maxwell Ltd, London; W. Green & Son Ltd, Edinburgh. £7 178 6d.

This work is divided into six separate parts. Part I (General Statement) sets out the law in narrative form by way of introduction to the Land Commission Act 1967 and its attendant regulations, orders, ministerial circulars and memoranda. Part II contains an annotated copy of the Act and follows closely the basic format of the British Tax Encyclopedia, volumes II to V, with its general notes, definitions and cross-references. Part III contains a number of related statutory provisions referred to in the 1967 Act or in the subordinate legislation, with annotations as considered necessary. Part IV sets out in full the regulations and orders made under the 1967 Act, while Part V contains the circulars, explanatory memoranda, etc., issued by the Ministry of Housing and Local Government which is responsible for the administration of the Act. Finally, under Part VI, come selected decisions of the Lands Tribunal which will become increasingly important to the practitioner as they build up.

When the work was published some months ago, it was indicated that the General Statement (Part II), the Table of Statutes, the Table of Statutory Instruments and the Table of Cases would be issued with the 'First Release' (supplement), while decisions of the Lands Tribunal (Part VI) would be digested as soon as possible. It is essential that purchasers of the work should obtain these, presumably by being registered with the publishers.

This is manifestly an important work in that it contains, or will contain, all the statute law relating to betterment levy and the Land Commission, the subordinate and associated legislation, the regulations, orders, circulars and memoranda, together with selected decisions of the Lands Tribunal in loose-leaf form under one cover, so that it can be brought up to date periodically. At £7 175 6d the cost may be a little forbidding except to the practitioner who is considerably involved. To him the comprehensive nature of the work, the periodic releases which will keep it up to date and the useful annotations of the statutory provisions will make a strong appeal. It is, however, essentially a reference work and not an easy-to-read work in narrative form with practical examples.

Farm Accounting and Management

Farm Planning Data 1967

by J. G. DAVIDSON.

Farm Economics Branch, School of Agriculture, Cambridge.

Mr Ford Sturrock, author of the first book, is the director of the Farm Economics Branch, School of Agriculture at Cambridge University which produced the second of these two publications, so we may perhaps be right to regard them as complementary. There is nowadays no shortage of advice for farmers, especially in the field of economics and these two books are crammed with information. The first is written mainly as a textbook for students of farm management, and the second is described by Mr Sturrock, who writes the foreword, as primarily for the use of N.A.A.S. officers. The latter contains some eighty pages closely packed with data which has been compiled from sources such as the Farm Management Survey and enterprise studies, from Fodder and Fertilizer Manufacturers, Fatstock Marketing Corporation, British Egg Marketing Board, and so forth. Generally the result is to provide a compendium of statistics, indicative of what can be regarded as good performance compared in many cases with something less than this. There is also much useful detail of costs related to performance.

In contrast Mr Sturrock's book seeks to put the farmer in the position of getting out the information about his own business to enable him or his advisers to make use of the information about standards. This is the latest edition of a work which first appeared twenty years ago, and which over the years has seen some very comprehensive changes in method. It also brings us up to date with a somewhat sketchy review of the present system of taxation including capital gains, corporation and selective employment taxes. In our view farm accounting and management as a means to efficiency and productivity are one subject and taxation is another.

We have not lost sight of the fact that this book is intended for farm students and this no doubt accounts for its considerable attention to a mass of detail which is hardly likely to find a place in the working farmer's routine. Dare we express the hope that equal importance is given to adequate instruction in such subjects as botany, biology, soil chemistry, meteorology, agricultural engineering, handling, packaging, management of labour and all the other skills which, when added together, go to make up that old-fashioned quality known as good husbandry.

The Companies Act 1967 – An Introduction

by J. A. Franks, Ll.M.

Oyez Publications, London. 27s 6d.

This is an attractive and interesting little book from which it is evident that the author has read his Hansard thoroughly and is familiar with the aims of the Act. It is easy to read and provides a useful introduction to the study of the Act itself. The work is divided into eight chapters (apart from the introduction) which deal, respectively, with directors and chairmen; accountants and auditors; State participation and control; banks, shipping and insurance companies; directors' reports; accounts; company registration and share transfer and control. An appendix contains a useful table of comparisons which shows the position of various kinds of trading organizations in relation to such matters as loans to directors, dealings by directors in share options, filing accounts with the registrar of companies, auditors' qualifications, etc. The work has imagination and the author considers the effect of the new Act in particular circumstances.

There are one or two errors. On page 42 it is stated that the power of the Board of Trade under section 37 of the Act is in addition to that conferred by section 169 (4) of the Companies Act 1948. Section 169 of the 1948 Act is, in fact, wholly repealed by Part III of Schedule 8 to the 1967 Act. Section 82 of the 1967 Act requires an insurance company to notify the Board of Trade of changes in officers and in the control of the company and its holding company within fourteen days. On page 12 of the book this period is wrongly given as seven days. But these small errors in no way detract from the merits of the book.

Whitaker's Almanack

J. Whitaker & Sons Ltd, London WC1. Complete edition, 27s 6d; shorter edition, paper covers, 15s.

On December 10th, 1868, Joseph Whitaker presented the first edition of his Almanack. Now in its one hundredth year, this valuable work of reference still bears some resemblance to the first slim volume of 363 pages – although the complete edition today contains more than one thousand two hundred and forty pages.

The overseas section now has a series of outline maps to indicate the geographical setting of the many new postwar independent countries. Another new feature, 'Topics of the day', includes references to decimal coinage, the Channel Tunnel project, and unit trusts.

The first edition contained seventeen pages devoted to Government and legal offices. In this one hundredth edition, over one hundred pages include references to the new British Steel Corporation, the Land Commission and the Industrial Reorganization Corporation. Notes and tables on the cost of living and comparative purchasing power of the £ from 1914 to the present day have also been introduced, together with new statistics on hospital and other National Health services.

Economic Activity

by G. C. HARCOURT, P. H. KARMEL and R. H. WALLACE. Cambridge University Press, London. 17s 6d, paperback edition; 50s cloth edition.

This book, by three Australian academic economists, is based on lecture courses to undergraduate audiences and draws upon Australian experience for illustrating the argument. To the extent that the dependence of the Australian economy on international trade is somewhat different from Britain's and her monetary institutions less highly developed, some of the analysis is not so relevant to the U.K. economy.

For the British reader, therefore, the main merit of the book lies in its national income approach and the use of Keynesian analysis for expounding the nature of economic equilibrium and its determinants. There is no comparable English text, although all the topics are discussed in various undergraduate texts. The treatment is thorough and quite 'rigorous', hence it is quite unsuited for the reader who wants a general introduction to applied economics. For the reader who has read one or two basic texts which have whetted his appetite for economics, this would be a sound book to work through.

Handbook of Management Technology

William Heinemann Ltd, London 45s.

It is often alleged that one of the main reasons for the 'brain drain' is that British senior management does not easily accept the modern techniques and ideas that intelligent business school-trained juniors would like to put into practice. Senior management can easily argue back that their main function is to get on with the job in hand, and not to waste too much time on fancy techniques with fine sounding names, some of which have still to be proved in practice and all of which need to be properly understood before they can be applied.

The answer to the latter problem is this book. In the space of 228 pages, the entire field of modern management technology is covered. Not surprisingly, in view of the rather limited span, some important developments have been dealt with summarily, or even omitted; value analysis and value engineering are notable examples of this.

But this handbook is not for the specialist student. No book of its size could be. Nevertheless it covers both the human aspects (business relationships, social psychology, manpower planning, communication and marketing) and the quantitative aspects (numeracy, computers, network planning, financial control, quality and design – together with a particularly good chapter on operational research by Eric Duckworth).

The editors are both associated with the Management Centre at the University of Bradford. They are to be congratulated on producing a guide to current methods which can be of great practical use to the busy manager.

Finance and Commerce

Joseph Cockshoot

OSEPH COCKSHOOT & CO LTD, whose accounts for the seven months to last July form this week's reprint, is in car trading and bulk fuel oil distribution. The accounts and the attendant directors' report are drawn up to comply, in all material matters, with the requirements of the Companies Act 1967.

The new year-end coincides with the company's main vehicle supply contracts and is considered a more desirable accounting date than December 31st. The actual year-end is now the Saturday nearest July 31st. In the directors' report shareholders are told that, during the period under review, the internal accounting procedures of the group were reorganized and certain staff changes made. This reorganization brought to light 'a number of matters of which the board was not previously aware and which have revealed the necessity for substantial additional provisions and write-offs'. In view of the need to make provision out of the reserves of the group for these items and adjustments which relate to previous years, the opportunity was taken to reorganize the presentation of the group's reserves, details of which are shown in the group profit and loss account.

Total revenue reserves and unappropriated profits as at December 31st, 1966, have been transferred to a special section of the group profit and loss account from which these amounts have been deducted.

Write-offs

The directors considered that no useful purpose was served by continuing to appropriate out of profits a sum equal to the premiums paid on mortgage redemption policies, as ultimately any such reserves must become an integral part of the unappropriated reserves and profits of the group. The existing mortgage redemption fund reserve has, therefore, been merged with the general reserves of the group.

Referring to the special provisions and adjustments, the directors' report states that terminal losses on closing down the engineering division proved to be £33,098 instead of an anticipated minimum of £25,000, but previous underprovisions as shown in the profit and loss account amounted to £22,819. In the case of the motor trading companies the reorganization of accounting procedures showed that provision for bad debts was inadequate and that a further provision of £16,582 was considered necessary. It was also found that in the last three years overriding commission receivable from motor vehicle suppliers had been calculated on an incorrect basis resulting in an overstatement of £27,723 over the period. This has been written off. Adjust-

Transfer of motors and accessories to The Parts Service Combine Ltd, in which Cockshoot has an effective 48 per cent interest, was completed during the period and it was considered prudent to add an additional £10,000 to the existing stock reserve, bringing the figure to £17,500 and to apply the sum in reduction of stock valuation.

Sales effort

Administrative changes have involved the reorganization of operations under four groups based on distributor companies in Manchester, Stockport, Bury and Kidderminster. The Department of Management Sciences of the University of Manchester Institute of Science and Technology is currently conducting a research project, in part financed by the company, on matters affecting organization and control throughout the Cockshoot Group.

On current trading the directors state that the return of severe credit restrictions following devaluation must inevitably continue to curb the latent demand for vehicles both new and used. In spite of this the company, whilst reducing costs wherever possible, is 'determined to intensify sales efforts'. Volume, it is admitted does not necessarily mean profit, and strict control is being maintained over the profitability of each individual car transaction.

Attention is also being concentrated on servicing and repair work and the retailing of spare parts and accessories. Closure of the engineering division has brought to an end losses which have resulted in a significant drain on group profits in recent years. All levels of management in the group, the board is convinced, are 'very conscious of the essential need to earn adequate profits and appropriate incentive schemes are in operation, affecting individual salesmen, branch and company managers and managing directors'.

New auditors

All this information – and more – is provided in the directors' report – one of the other important items being the decision of Pitt & Co not to seek reappointment as the company's auditors. Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co are to be the new auditors.

Mr Graham A. Norris, the chairman, comments in his statement with the accounts that from the 'exceptional difficulties' with which the company has been presented, the organization has emerged leaner but more efficient. There will be more effective control of the company's affairs.

Lest the impression is given that the company has been solely concerned with internal administrative reorganization, Mr Norris points to physical developments such as the opening of a used car showroom in Manchester in premises previously occupied by the central accounts department, the establishment of a vehicle repair workshop in premises previously occupied by the engineering division and a decision to embark on a substantial extension and modernization scheme at Stockport.

It will be interesting to see how the internal reorganization affects current year operations. An interim statement is to be made next May and, if the current level of profits is maintained, payment of an interim dividend will be considered. No payment is being made in respect of the seven months covered by the accounts.

WITH A POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK INVESTMENT ACCOUNT

Investment Accounts are on the up and up. When they began eighteen months ago, they yielded 5½%. Now they give an interest rate of 6%.

That's not bad progress.

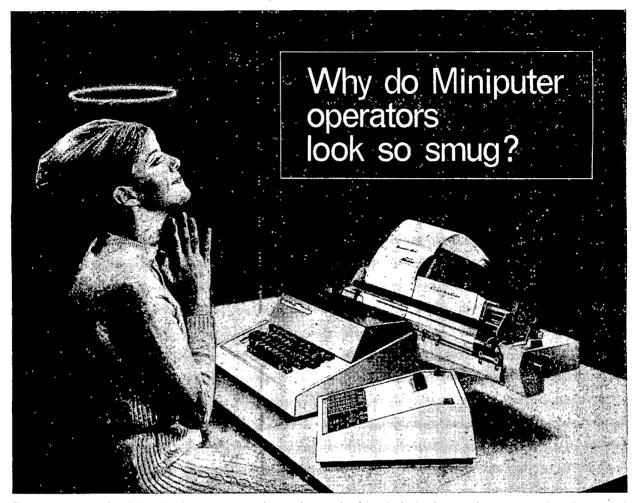

It's another good reason for recommending them to clients whose capital isn't working hard enough.

And there's still the same 100% safety.
Still the same convenience: deposits and withdrawals can be made at any of 21,000 Savings Bank Post Offices.

To qualify, your clients should have £50 in an ordinary Post Office account. The minimum deposit is £1; there is a top limit of £5,000. As you'd expect, one month's notice is asked for withdrawals.

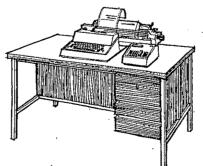

There's a helpful leaflet about Investment Accounts; it's available at any Savings Bank Post Office.

Because any one MINIPUTER operator is doing the work of a whole invoicing department. Until she met a MINIPUTER she was probably a fairly ordinary copy typist, then a couple of hours later she was doing the most involved arithmetical calculations at unbelievable speed, cutting the average 25 steps of a normal invoicing operation down to just 3. You can hardly blame her for feeling clever. This is electronically programmed invoicing—with a built-in computer doing all the necessary mathematical calculations at the rate of 166 per second. This is a desk-top operation which can be carried out in any office. The MINIPUTER unit is the fastest, simplest, most economical method of producing documents involving virtually any form of calculations in any combination or sequence—in any quantity or currency . . . and needless to say, Decimalization is a simple matter.

If your secretary will be kind enough to complete the coupon we will send you a comprehensive and informative brochure on this remarkable miniature computer.

CITY NOTES

OR all the alarms and tumult of Government spending revisions and an early Budget, the equity market is back to its two old loves – the inevitability of inflation and the force of take-over deals.

For all the revisions, Government spending will rise substantially this year – and unproductively. If taxation in the March 19th Budget is radically increased, then the combined inflationary forces of rising Government expenditure and rising taxation will remain unabated.

If popular take-over forecasts – even the hoariest of forecasts – keep on being confirmed by events, then the driving force of take-over talk and take-over fact will become stronger still. Last October's announcement of a 'one for four' scrip issue and share split from £1 to 5s by Leyland led immediately to firm forecasts of 'Leyland-B.M.H. to merge share for share'. Three months later the forecast proved correct.

Probably the take-over factor is the strongest single influence on the stock-market now. That may seem an over-simplification of a complicated position, but the investment search for the special situation share, the official prompting of mergers through the Industrial Reorganization Corporation, the natural wariness of holders to sell in case of a bid, and the way mergers take shares out of investment circulation are all factors combining to lock in equity holders, attract buyers and induce share shortage.

WHILE equity market operators continue to think in terms of inflation, there is in some minds a reawakening of doubts concerning just the reverse – the fear of deflation in world economic terms. The chairman of Westminster Bank this week drew attention to the economic dangers implicit in the situation of both the world's two reserve currency nations simultaneously taking action to plug substantial payment deficit gaps. Governments have for so long lived with economic expansion and inflation disguising mismanagement that it may take only a minor recession in world trading to uncover weak positions. Companies can appear prosperous while they overtrade, but when the overtrading stops they crash – and companies have no monopoly in that.

BANKERS voice growing concern at the maintenance of 8 per cent Bank rate. The high level of Bank rate combined with the arbitrary restriction of lending is a deadening combination both on the banks and their customers. Of particular concern in connection with the lending restriction is the question of agreed borrowing limits. The gap between actual lending and agreed limits is presently put as wide as 45 per cent and, should demand for the exercise of those limits develop, the banks will be hard pressed to meet obligations under those limits while at the same time fitting the higher lendings within the straitjacket of the overall lending directive.

F all the major mergers currently in train, the English Electric-International Computers and Tabulators affair seems to be taking the longest to get anywhere. Colonel A. T. Maxwell, I.C.T.'s chairman, has belatedly admitted that the Government is concerned in talks with the two companies to create a single autonomous British computer organization. The City supposition is that the computer businesses of the two organizations will be sunk into a separate company with I.R.C. probably supplying loan capital. There is, however, a firm view still held that English Electric will make an outright bid for I.C.T. and the latter's share price reflects that view rather than the idea of merged business through a jointly, although not necessarily equally, owned company. The point that the Vickers group, which owns 23½ per cent of I.C.T., will benefit financially either way has not by any means been lost on a take-over conscious stock-market.

Current Law

Statutory Power of Advancement Excluded

PY a settlement dated November 21st, 1946, the settlor in Re Evans' Settlement, Watkins v. Whitworth Jones ([1967] 3 All E.R. 343) directed that income of a trust fund was to be paid to his wife for life and subject thereto the trustees were to hold the trust fund in trust in equal shares for the settlor's children. The trustees had powers to raise sums not exceeding in all £10,000 and to pay it over or use it for the benefit of his wife or of the children.

On the question whether the power of advancement in the settlement in favour of the children excluded the statutory power of advancement under section 32, Trustee Act 1925, Stamp, J., held that although an express power of advancement in a settlement would not exclude the statutory power, on the construction of the settlement in question, the existence of the two powers was inconsistent so that an intention should be implied to exclude the application of the statutory power in relation to the children.

Creation of Trust

THE facts in Re Tyler's Fund Trusts, Graves v. King ([1967] 3 All E.R. 389) were that on March 14th, 1951, T made her will appointing K and G her executors. The will included a legacy of £500 to K. On May 9th, 1951, T wrote to K saying that she wished him to hold the £1,500 which she had put in his control, for certain specified purposes which she set out in the letter. T died on June 7th, 1954. On June 24th, 1954, K signed a memorandum that £1,500 had been placed in his hands by T for the benefit of G. K stated that authority was given by T to K to divide the funds available on the death of G among the institutions mentioned in the memorandum and any other charitable institutions in the proportions that he thought desirable. It was also stated that T directed that one-third of the amount available should be retained by K for his own use and benefit if he should then be alive; but if he should then be dead, £500 should be paid to his executors and the remainder should be divided between the societies mentioned in the memorandum. K died in December 1960 and G died in April 1966.

On the question of the terms and validity of the trusts created by T in May 1951, Pennycuick, J., held first, that the letter of May 9th, 1951, constituted a valid assignment in writing by T to K of an equitable interest. Second, that although the memorandum signed by K was admissible as evidence under section 1, Evidence Act 1938, it was insufficient to establish a trust of £500 in favour of those claiming under K, having regard to the fact that there was a quasi professional relationship between K and T and the bequest of the like amount of £500 given by T's will two months earlier. Third, an intention appeared from the memorandum that the balance of the fund should be distributed among charitable institutions and accordingly the balance would be applied by way of scheme for the benefit of charity.

Winding-up: Board of Trade Petition

RE Allied Produce Co Ltd ([1967] 3 All E.R. 399) was the result of a petition presented by the Board of Trade pursuant to section 169 (3), Companies Act 1948, for the winding-up of a company. The petition was based on an inspector's report setting out serious breaches of the Companies Act 1948 committed by the company, and was supported by an affidavit by an official of the Board of Trade exhibiting copies of the statement contained in the petition and verifying them in general terms. The official also exhibited a copy of the inspector's report and deposed that he believed the facts set out therein to be true and that the opinions contained in it were the opinions of the inspector. The petition was unopposed.

Buckley, J., held, ordering that the company be wound up, that on an uncontested, as opposed to a contested, petition based on grave allegations against the company and presented pursuant to section 169 (3), by the Board of Trade, hearsay evidence was sufficient.

Winding-up: Costs

N Re Bostels Ltd ([1967] 3 All E.R. 425) the original petitioner for a compulsory winding-up order accepted payment of its debt and most of its costs of the petition from the company. The petition was then amended, pursuant to an order of the Court, by substituting another creditor as petitioner, re-advertisement being dispensed with and the original petitioner remaining in the proceedings as a supporting creditor. A winding-up order was made on the amended petition.

On the question of whether the original petitioner's costs could be included in the costs of the petition, Pennycuick, J., held that the costs of the petition would include the original petitioner's costs limited to the fee on presentation of the petition and the costs of the advertisement.

No Fraudulent Preference

THE company in Re F.L.E. Holdings Ltd ([1967] 3 All E.R. 553), which at all relevant times was under the control of B, an undischarged bankrupt, was indebted to a bank for money advanced, to secure which title deeds to the company's factory had been deposited with the bank on July 1st, 1965. The bank omitted to register the charge under section 95, Companies Act 1948, but on July 16th, 1965, there was registered what was described as an oral charge dated July 16th, 1965, although nothing relevant took place on that date.

On September 29th, 1965, when the company was insolvent, a legal charge was executed in favour of the bank in consequence of requests by them. No pressure upon the company to repay was exercised by the bank and no promise was made to the company to increase the company's overdraft facilities. On October 18th, 1965, a petition was presented by a creditor for the compulsory winding-up of the company. The order was made on January 17th, 1966.

On an application by the liquidator for an order that the legal charge in favour of the bank be deemed a fraudulent preference, Pennycuick, J., held that the execution of the charge was not a fraudulent preference under section 320, Companies Act 1948, since the dominant intention of B at that time was not to prefer the bank to other creditors but to keep on good terms with the bank in the hope of future banking facilities.

Breach of Trust

THE plaintiff in Re Lucking's Will Trusts, Renwick v. Lucking ([1967] 3 All E.R. 726) was beneficially interested in the testatrix's trust estate which included a holding of 6,980 ordinary shares in a private company. There was at first only one trustee, L, who was a son of the testatrix and held 2,920 ordinary shares in the company of which he was also a director. As the result of an approach made by L to D in October 1954, D was appointed a director of the company, and entered into an agreement, terminable in 1955 or 1956, to act as manager of the business for five years at a salary and commission.

The directors decided that the company should have two accounts. No. 2 account was a confidential account and cheques on it were to be signed by two directors. A practice grew up by which D sent L blank cheques which L signed. D overdrew this account and became indebted to the company, the debt appearing in the company's accounts as 'loan to a director'. Although L learnt of this in 1957 he did not cease the practice of signing blank cheques. The gross profits increased under D's management, but so did D's indebtedness until in 1960 the accounts showed L that D's indebtedness exceeded £8,000. D falsely stated that he had repaid £4,000 and L did not check this. In 1961 D was dismissed and subsequently became bankrupt. In 1956 L had appointed B a co-trustee although he did not tell B that the 'loan to a director' represented overdrawings by D, until September 1960. L did not tell B that the £4,000 had not been repaid until D's dismissal.

In an action by the plain: iff against L and B for breach of trust, Cross, J., held that in failing to supervise D's drawings after 1957, L had failed in his duty as trustee; but that B was entitled to rely on L's statements as being accurate; and that in the circumstances no failure on B's part in his duty as trustee was established.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Off the Scent

SIR, – May I make a rejoinder to 'False trails in accounting' in The Accountant of July 29th last, the author of which, I suggest, has wandered down some false trails himself – together with a few ideas of my own for good measure.

LIFO

LIFO is unfortunately typical of the profession; an attempt to kill two birds with one stone and, as Mr Matthews writes, 'balances the books' but if it gives a true picture this is fortuitous. But it is not only with stocks that this happens. There are three different matters involved: operational efficiency, buying (including stockholding) efficiency and marketing efficiency.

Now operational efficiency can only be measured by setting current costs against current revenues. Thus material usage must be charged at current prices. LIFO may approximate to this – or it may not – its virtue – or vice if you prefer – is that it balances, if necessary by distorting balance sheet values.

What, of course, should happen is that the difference between current cost, charged to production, and actual cost, credited to stores account, should be shown as a nonoperating gain or loss due to stockholding in times of changing prices. However, we should then also do the same thing with for example, rent. Production should be charged with the current value of the premises and the difference between that and the actual rent shown as a non-operating gain or loss. Likewise depreciation, contracted salaries, etc.

One odd point here. For many years writers have advocated divorcing cost of materials used from price changes of purchased materials. I have not yet seen a similar argument advanced – though clearly it is just as valid – for similarly divorcing price changes in finished goods from production cost. In all logic, if the accounts are to show 'current' figures then the credit to production must be the current figure when produced, and changes in realizable prices between time of production and time of sale must be treated as non-operating gains and losses in the same way as price changes on raw materials.

These gains and losses are indeed, as Mr Matthews writes, significant figures. But are published accounts the place to provide them? Where do we stop? We will end up with something like a trading and profit and loss account in terms of standard costs with a whole string of price variances following the standard profit.

This is all very well for the management, but I don't think it would necessarily be a gain to the shareholder receiving his accounts in that form. Whilst he likes to know that his company is operating profitably he is more concerned that it is acting profitably, and would sooner it lost £1,000 on trading and made £10,000 on price changes than that it made merely £5,000 on trading.

'Fictitious' profits

Most writers discussing inflationary profits assert that they are fictitious and therefore should not be taxed. In this they quite ignore the fact that taxes should be based, inter alia, on ability to pay. If goods are sold after a period of inflation the seller is better off than the person who held, say, Government securities, during that period. He is therefore quite justly taxed on the 'fictitious' gain, as the following example shows:

- A holds £100 Government Stock and over a year earns £8 interest.
- B buys £100 goods and after a year sells in the same market (i.e., there is no mark-up) after inflation for £200.

Whilst B has in fact made no dealing profit, he now possesses £200; A possesses only £108. Even after paying tax at 50 per cent B will have £150 against A's £104. That B has not maintained his real capital is beside the point here. He has retained 75 per cent of it, compared with A's 52 per cent, so has no claim to favoured treatment.

Direct v. absorption costing

The point here is surely 'when do profits arise?' I say that they arise on sales, not on production. If two years' production is sold in one year, it is a fact that that year produced a large profit and the former year a loss. The profit must be the same in the year of sale whether the goods were produced over one or over two years (see Example 1).

Admittedly the profits are in total the same, but I maintain that they do, in fact, fluctuate from a loss in year 1 to a profit in year 2. This is the true picture; the business loses money until sales reach £430 when it breaks even, thereafter making 233½ per cent on direct costs (Example 2). I see no justification for showing any other result in either 'cost' or 'annual' accounts.

From the result of year 1, in Example 3, drawn up on the basis of absorption costing, it would seem that six years without sales would leave the business no worse off. In fact they would probably bankrupt it! Example 1 emphasizes that year 1 is tolerable only if the sales in year 2 materialize and this is, I consider, the true and fair view.

Cash flow

Mr Matthews states that '... when ... cash flow is greater than net income ... conclusion is ... business is ... (liquidating) its non-cash assets'. Quite correct. Depreciation is liquidation of non-cash assets. To what is he objecting?

He then complains that replacement does not show in the profit and loss account – 'and so goes unnoticed'. This is, of course, nonsense. Depreciation is reflected in the profit and loss account, replacement is reflected in the cash flow. If the business is not in fact 'liquidating its fixed assets' but replacing them, the result is the same whether by profit and loss account with depreciation, or cash flow statement with replacement outlay. However, a quid in the hand is worth two (or at least one and a bit) on the books, so how does he reckon that cash flow bears no significant relationship to investment? Is he prepared to accept his next six months' salary in a lump at the end of the six months?

Depreciation

I cannot see how it can be held that 'diminishing assets value must be matched by a diminishing benefit per annum'. A three-year lease at £600 gives the same benefit in the second year as the first, though clearly its value at the end of the first year has diminished.

There are two factors justifying straight-line depreciation in normal cases. First, maintenance does not increase regularly with age. The benefit from a fully maintained asset is fairly constant throughout most of its life, and if it is desired to equalize the maintenance cost this can be done. To mix this equalization with the depreciation charge and try to offset one against the other is simply to cause confusion. (Note: depreciation on an hourly rate basis is a form of 'straight line' charging each hour with the same benefit.)

Secondly, equipment may be obsolete before it is worn out, which is to say that the benefits are obtained over a shorter life than otherwise. It is a question of degree, not of kind, and a flat annual charge to cover wear and tear and obsolescence is likely to be as close to the true annual 'loss of asset value' as any attempt to apportion wear and tear more accurately, as error in obsolescence estimate will usually exceed wear and tear fluctuations, as is shown in diagram I (see preceding column).

It will be seen that A-B gives as reasonable approximation to C-D, as does E-F.

Debenture issue discount

Mr Matthews' 'orthodox' accounting is the most unorthodox I have seen and certainly would not have passed any of my audits. He is quite right in stating that if £90,000 cash only is borrowed then only £90,000 needs replacing from profits. There is certainly no justification for providing for discount as well, this will be written off as part of the interest charge. If the gross debt is provided for, then there is no need to write off the discount until the debt is repaid, when it will be written off against the sinking fund, thus again leaving the net sum as the increment to profits, which is the case. However, this method is incorrect in that it fails to show the cost year by year, but inflates the figure of the sinking fund provided from profits, in all except the final year.

The point to be remembered is that the sinking fund is not a charge against income but appropriation of profits, and as such the sinking fund is only a subdivision of undistributed profits. So far as the business is concerned it is quite irrelevant how much is called 'contribution to sinking fund'; what matters is whether the cash is there to repay the debt.

I am amused, however, at Mr Matthews' straight-line' sinking fund; which is such a naïve contrast to his criticism of straight-line depreciation and yet far less justified.

Valuation of investments

It is conventional to value investments held as current assets at the lower of cost or mid-market price. But this is quite inconsistent with the value attributed to other current assets of 'lower of cost or selling price'. London quoted prices are not a range of selling prices, but are selling and buying prices.

Consistency demands that current assets investments should be valued at the lower of cost or 'realizable value less selling expenses', that is, the lower quotation less brokers' charges.

Who will be the one to blaze this trail – the only one justified by logic? Or maybe we shall see stocks valued at mid-way between buying and selling prices, ignoring selling expenses.

I await with interest the auditors' report on the first published accounts so prepared.

Yours faithfully,

Blantyre, Malawi. E. R. KERMODE, F.C.A., A.I.M.T.A.

Published Company Accounts

SIR, — In Mr Greener's article, 'Published Company Accounts', in your issue of January 6th, he refers to the Dimbula Valley judgment as authorizing the distribution of unrealized capital profits, but I venture to question this authority. It is, of course, contrary to our upbringing in this profession and I think it needs a precise legal decision in order to give us sufficient confidence to abandon the prudent principles on which we were raised. Is it not a fact that obiter dicta have much less validity in fixing the law than decisions on the facts themselves? Whilst one of the law lords in this case did say that a genuine surplus on revaluation could be distributed, this was in fact not something which had occurred, indeed, another of the law lords said that: "There is, so far as I know, no present intention of the company... capitalizing any of its undistributed profits'.

The ruling – or observation – about the distribution of unrealized profits being permissible was argued in the terms that the capitalization of reserve by the issue of bonus shares was precisely the equivalent of a cash dividend in the sense that it had to be permissible for a dividend to be declared as a first step, the application of this to the payment up of further capital being regarded as a separate matter. Many people would hold this thesis to be debatable, but the important point is that the company had not distributed an unrealized surplus and I would therefore question the conclusion confidently quoted by Mr Greener.

This reminds one of the general conclusion which I have always questioned, that a dividend can be paid out of current profits despite the existence of previous losses. There is no legal case in which this has, in fact, occurred but the conclusion has been drawn, wrongly I would suggest, from obiter dicta in all the cases which we read up in sitting for our examinations.

Yours faithfully,

Enfield.

Static Payroll System

SIR, – I refer to Mr R. S. Martin's letter in your issue of December 23rd. The organization by which I am employed is able to pay the salaries of the staff of its South African office by banker's standing order, including a standing order for P.A.Y.E. to their Collector of Taxes.

Gross tax and net rates remain static unless altered by increment and the system appears quite readily to provide for any necessary adjustment direct between the tax office and the employee at the end of the year. How beneficial it would be if our own Chancellor could learn from South Africa.

Yours faithfully,

H. M. C. HARWOOD.

Professional Advertising

SIR, – As integration of the professional accountancy bodies is in the offing, why do they continue to squander their members' funds on competitive advertising?

The Institute could possibly make out a doubtful case for their pictures of handsome chartered accountants in industry on the grounds of seeking articled-clerk fodder. The Association, however, seem to have no case whatsoever for trying to induce graduates intent on entering industry to study for their examinations where those of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants would be far more appropriate.

Yours faithfully, A.C.A., A.I.M.T.A.

Advertising Orders on Microfilm

As the number of subscribers for G.P.O. telephones increases, so does the expenditure on telephone directory advertising. With a turnover of £25 million annually, the sole contractor, Thomson Directories Ltd, have turned to microfilm to assist them in recording, storing and sending out information regarding advertising orders.

Each day's orders and correspondence are filmed on the Kodak Reliant 600 microfilmer, and the film processed on their own Prostar processing unit. Each document is sequentially numbered as it passes through the camera unit, so that any single order can be retrieved from over a quarter of a million within thirty seconds and viewed on a Recordak reader/printer. In case of dispute, a copy can be produced quickly.

It is estimated that the number of orders is likely to rise to three-quarters of a million by 1972–73, when virtually all directories will have 'yellow pages' of advertising. The reels of microfilm are kept in a fireproof safe overnight for safety.

First 4-30 Computer Installation

THE FIRST full-scale installation of the smallest machine in English Electric Computers' System 4 range is now in an advanced stage of program trials at the offices of the Imperial Smelting Corporation, a subsidiary of the Rio Tinto-Zinc Corporation Ltd.

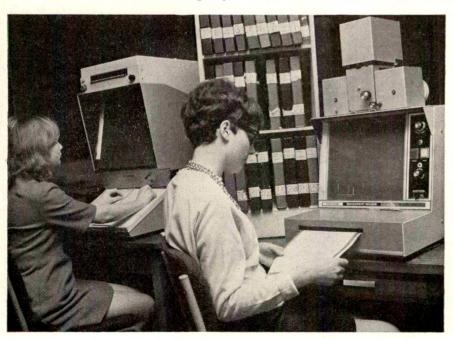

The machine, a System 4-30 of mixed tape and disc configuration, was delivered at the end of October and its first job – processing a payroll of 4,000 – will go 'live' on the machine within the next few weeks. The company will use the 4-30 to handle all accounting, technical and management calculations and to provide a complete management information system for all its United Kingdom offices and works. The computer will also take over the Rio Tinto-Zinc Corporation's register of more than 35,000 shareholders.

The machine consists of a central processor with 65 KB store, together with a wide complement of peripherals. The latter equipment includes a 750 lines-per-minute printer, paper tape reader, two 30 KB magnetic tape units and two replaceable disc units.

Planning Computer Data Networks

MANY ORGANIZATIONS which will be installing large computers in the next few years are planning data transmission networks so that their branch offices, showrooms, warehouses or factories may all have access to the data processing power of the central machine. These networks will be formed by using communication circuits leased from the G.P.O. to link stations containing remote devices with the central computer. As these circuits are leased on a yearly rental basis based on radial distance, it is important that the length of the network be kept to a minimum.

The operations research department of English Electric Computers Ltd has developed a special program which can create a network linking a given number of stations to a central point at, it is claimed, the minimum yearly rental costs. A recent run of the program produced an economical network linking forty geographical locations to a central point, with different numbers of devices at each station.

The program is capable of allowing for any number of devices in each of up to one hundred stations in different locations in England, Scotland and Wales. In planning the network, the program takes into account factors including the yearly cost of renting different types of communication circuit, and the distance of each station from its neighbours and the central computer. In some instances it is more feasible to link a single station, far from any others, directly to the computer – in others a group of stations near to one another might share a circuit.

In operation, the program produces six alternative networks – three linking only the devices to the computer and three incorporating device links and speech lines – each of which represents a different level of economy in the use of communication circuits. These networks range from the maximum possible coverage, i.e. a single circuit direct from each device to the computer, to the 'minimum cost network' in which as many devices as possible share multiple circuits.

Copying and Duplicating

THE Class 455-I PCMI transparency reader demonstrates the use by the National Cash Register Company of photochromic technology for economical mass dissemination of information with rapid retrieval. The process of PCMI (Photo-Chromic Micro Imagery) offers two important advantages to business organizations which disseminate bulk information to multiple points: the cost of transparency reproduction is considerably less than for producing conventional microfilm in comparable volume and secondly, distribution costs are also lower.

By using grainless quality photochromic material, microimages of up to 40,000:1 reduction are produced. These are to be compared with conventional micro-image reduction of 400:1. The PCMI images are retained upon transparencies measuring only 6 by 4 in. and can be read very simply and cheaply by means of the NCR Transparency Reader.

Compact Computer Exhibition

A NUMBER of American computer manufacturers are designing small- to medium-size computers, and sixteen of them have combined to run an exhibition train to four cities in Britain, after an initial showing of the equipment earlier this month at the United States Trade Centre in London.

The train is this week visiting Moor Street Station, Birmingham, on Thursday, Friday (10 a.m. to 6.30 p.m.), and Saturday (10 a.m. to 1 p.m.).

From there it will go to Manchester Victoria Station on Monday, January 29th (10 a.m. to 5 p.m.); Tuesday (10 a.m. to 6.30 p.m.), and Wednesday (10 a.m. to 1 p.m.).

At Newcastle Central Station, the same times will be repeated on Thursday, February 1st, Friday and Saturday, whilst Glasgow Stobcross Freight Depot will be the last call, with similar times on Monday, February 5th, Tuesday 6th, and Wednesday, February 7th.

Smooth Filing System

METAL runners of the Twinlock Crystalfile now have nylon linings so that they glide along the chassis rails with a quiet, smooth action. Gone, the painful screech of metal—gone, the sticking folders that fray tempers and waste time.

Crystalfile folders are available in standard, double capacity, apron and pocket versions, with a choice of four tabs – clear Crystal Tab, metal Clicktab, flexible Crystal Link and the new Crystal Magnatab – a plastic slip-on tab that magnifies the printed insertion. Also new is a series of filing cupboards in three six-foot designs – two-door, quarter-door and roller blind. Each cupboard now accommodates either six Crystal Lateral chassis or five Lateral 'D' Chassis with fifty or more lateral folders to each chassis.

instructions and selecting programs. There is a print-out mechanism which operates at thirty characters per second and has a capacity of twenty-three digits plus the decimal point and symbols.

The program is read in from a magnetic card and is transferred to the memory, where three operating registers will store up to twenty-two digits each. The five numeric registers will store intermediate results or constant data, whilst the two program storage registers have a capacity of forty-eight instructions which may be increased to a total of 120 instructions by using three of the five numeric registers.

There is a specially written programmed learning self-instruction book which has been written by Cambridge Consultants (Training) Ltd, from which it is claimed that anyone with a basic knowledge of algebra can teach themselves how to program and operate the computer in approximately ten hours.

For those more interested in what the machine will do for them as a prospective buyer, the book also contains two pages listing the possible uses such as currency conversion (sterling to francs, dollars or marks) or complex percentage discounts, commissions, compound interest and so on.

The Programma 101 costs £1,890.

THE INSTITUTE OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS OF SCOTLAND Post Qualifying Education

As part of the post qualifying education programme of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, two courses are to be held during February and March. One of the courses will be on computers, the other on network analysis. Both are open not only to members of the Institute, but also to members of the kindred accountancy bodies.

The computer course comprising six separate sessions will be held during February at the I.B.M. Service Bureau and Education Department, 15 Lodge Road, London NW8, and will take the form of an introduction to the subject of computers and automatic data processing through lectures, discussions, a practical exercise in the preparation of flow-charts and the writing of a simple program. There will also be a visit to a computer installation during which the program written by participants will be run.

The network analysis course will take place during February and March in London and Edinburgh, and in March in Glasgow. It will be in two parts – elementary and advanced. The former will include the structure of a network, finding the critical path through a network, and introduction to PERT. The advanced part of the course will deal with probabilistic time estimates and PERT, costing the critical path, and PERT on the computer.

Further particulars of the courses may be obtained from the Director of Post Qualifying Education, The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, 27 Queen Street, Edinburgh, 2. Those wishing to attend the courses are advised to submit their applications as soon as possible.

"There's a fortune in the idea-if only we had the capital to exploit it"

Sometimes it seems that the easiest stage of a real technical advance is the idea itself, and that the more difficult stages are its application, development and eventual marketing. For these stages finance is needed, and it is frustrating to conceive the idea and then be unable to raise the money to exploit it.

T.D.C. was formed to meet this need—to assist companies, associations or individuals who have made a substantial technical advance but are held up for finance at the commercial stage. If you think that T.D.C. could help, begin by sending for our booklet 'Capital for Technical Innovation'.

AN IMPORTANT NEW BOOK Third reprint now available

MANUAL OF AUDITING by Vivian R. V. Cooper, F.C.A.

UNITED KINGDOM

Extracts from recent Reviews

The Accountant - July 9th, 1966 - DESIGN FOR AUDITING

The author and his colleagues review the whole practice of auditing in meticulous detail. Nothing appears to have been omitted ... Perhaps the most noteworthy single chapter in the book is that dealing with auditing procedures for computer applications and the pendant internal control questionnaire, not only because the material is novel ... but also because of the lucidity of the explanations given.

The Accountants' Magazine - October 1966 - A CONTEMPORARY CLASSIC

The author – whether it is his desire or not – through Manual of Auditing, recently published is destined to stand out with earlier 'greats'... A new approach to the old problems has been achieved with a practicality and clear insight which constantly impresses ... Here is a very real contribution to the literature of accounting, it should certainly have priority as book of the month (any month) for practitioners; it is expensive but cheap at the price.

* THIS IMPORTANT WORK NOW IN ITS FOURTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION AND COMPLETELY UP TO DATE manual of computer Systems Edited by BRIAN A. MAYNARD M.A., F.C.A., A.C.W.A.

President of the O.E.E.C. mission to the U.S.A. on 'Integrated Data Processing and Computers'.

is an important breakthrough in a field of national importance. Here at last is an authoritative work of reference on computers used for data processing in the United Kingdom which succeeds in reducing a bewildering mass of unco-ordinated data and much hitherto unavailable information to a tabulated and readily assimilable form.

It is thus a valuable time-saver to all concerned with obtaining accurate basic information for unbiased decisions about computer systems - speeding up decisions, reducing the chances of wrong ones and saving the time of key staff of both potential users and the computer manufacturers.

There is, therefore, no longer any reason for wasting time and money in order to obtain factual background information which is now available at a fraction of the cost of obtaining it for oneself.

AN ESSENTIAL WORK OF REFERENCE COMBINED WITH A QUARTERLY UP-DATING SERVICE

As a result of an increase in the number of subscribers, we are pleased to announce that, as from the next quarter, it will be possible to provide a greatly improved up-dating service for the same annual subscription. In future, all amendments will be in the form of new sheets so that manual alterations will not be necessary. In addition to new systems, it is also envisaged that the descriptions of each of four main systems will be completely reprinted at least once a year to incorporate in the main body of the text such new features as may appear during the year

The features of each system are discussed in detail

Keeping Track of Grants

NVESTMENT grants have been spared in the recent retrenchment plans, although hopes of accelerated repayment have been deferred. Prospects for an extended lease of life for grants invites further consideration of their place in the economy of recipient companies and the Technical Studies Committee of The Society of Investment Analysts has made recommendations — so far as treatment of investment grants in accounts is concerned — which were recently approved by the Society.

The committee reviewed the earlier recommendations of the Scottish Institute (The Accountant, September 17th, 1966), the English Institute (March 11th, 1967 issue) and others, noting with some surprise the lack of agreement for which it, nevertheless, saw a possible explanation in the different principles they applied. Entire approval was expressed for the Scottish distinction between capital employed and the assets in which the capital is invested. Moreover, the function of a tax equalization reserve as a store of that part of the grant which reflected tax relief denied was reconsidered at some length.

The Society stressed the interest of the investment analyst in 'clean' figures for the items in the trading account and especially in 'consistent and comprehensible' depreciation figures. Hence the wish to see segregation of the contribution over the years made by grants towards mitigation of the gross depreciation charge, disclosure of which serves to indicate not merely allocation of expense but effective consumption of wealth, prudent requirements for future financing and trading efficiency in the context of the company's return on capital employed.

Thus a company's accounts ought to show the effect of the receipt of a grant on a company located in a development area, in which case both industrialist and analyst would want to know to what extent the actual financial return masked a low trading return on capital employed.

In considering objections to the credit of investment grants to profit and loss account over a period of time, the committee bluntly declared that grants were in reality available for the ultimate benefit of the equity shareholders. This they regarded as consistent with the English Institute's dictum that availability of grants would influence decisions to incur capital expenditure – decisions normally taken with an eye on the effect on earnings.

Such policies often rest on a slender statistical basis and it is clearly desirable that full details of the method adopted in handling the grants should be made known in the published accounts.

Inland Revenue Accounts

*HERE are some disquieting disclosures about the Inland Revenue's administration of the Income Tax Acts in the Comptroller and Auditor-General's report on the Civil Appropriation Accounts, 1966, published last week (H.M.S.O. 32s 6d). Referring to claims for relief in respect of wives, children and dependent relatives, he says that in practice tax inspectors 'often' accept without further investigation declarations of entitlement to these reliefs. If the dependants are abroad, he says that the declarations are 'specially scrutinized and, if there is doubt whether the claim is genuine, evidence is required of registration of births and marriages and of regular remittances of money for the support of the dependants'. The report then refers to countries where the facilities for registration 'are still developing'. In the case of those countries, the inspector normally requires 'other supporting evidence' before the personal reliefs are granted.

In April 1966, no doubt as a result of investigation of individual cases, the Inland Revenue decided to institute a pilot scheme to test the validity of claims in selected cases. From twenty tax districts (presumably chosen as having many taxpayers with dependants, or alleged dependants, abroad) 1,000 claimants were required to produce certificates of registration of births and marriages (or alternative evidence of entitlement) and the documents produced were then investigated to discover whether they were genuine. By January 1967 it was clear that the proportion of fraudulent claims for non-resident dependants was high.

Last October the Revenue told the Comptroller that a further review of the pilot scheme suggested that around 55 per cent of the claims in the sample were fraudulent. This indicated an overall loss of tax, due to fraud, of around £5 million to £7 million a year, and a cumulative loss to October 1967 of some four times that amount; say £28 million. The estimates are still tentative as final results of the pilot scheme will not be available for some time, mainly because of the time taken to obtain information from overseas.

The Inland Revenue in June 1967 offered an amnesty to fraudulent claimants who confessed by September 30th, 1967, and 1,409 accepted this offer. By so doing they avoided prosecution, but not the tax and not necessarily the civil penalties for fraudulent claims. The department do not think it practicable to extend the detailed inquiries of the pilot scheme to the whole field of suspect personal allowance claims. They say they find great difficulties in establishing whether claims for overseas dependants are genuine or false, considerable knowledge of local conditions, it is stated, being necessary. The Inland Revenue do not even think it possible to 'distil' the varied experience, derived by officials operating the pilot scheme, into standard instructions which would enable local tax districts themselves to test the claims in the same way. Questions of extending the pilot scheme arrangements, or instituting some other action are, however, under consideration.

This is most unsatisfactory to the vast body of honest taxpayers who are carrying these fraudulent claimants on their backs. A loss of $\pounds 7$ million a year by fraudulent personal allowance claims alone, on the part of a comparatively few blatantly dishonest people, is of a staggering magnitude. The same report says that the total receipts for the full year, 1966-67, from the fantastically complicated capital gains tax barely exceeded the same figure of $\pounds 7$ million. Surely infinitely more time is spent by officials on capital gains tax work, frequently to reveal in the end a net gain or loss of a few shillings. Here is another reason for abolishing capital gains tax – to free the officials to collect a comparable amount by far less exertion.

The report contains the usual figures of back duty, or what the report calls 'investigations into underassessment resulting from fraud or evasion of taxes on income and profits'. They are:

Year en March		Number of cases	Total charges raised	Penalties and interest included
1967	• •	11,154	14,722,018	4,731,028
1966		[11,618	14,200,366	4,648,336
1965		12,405	15,965,295	4,897,498
1964		12,216	15,563,617	•4,655,467
1963		10,944	14,020,699	4,289,258
1962		11,868	18,770,906	5,200,427

It seems that the recent downward trend has now been reversed. The figures do not include minor settlements effected by local tax inspectors relating to interest, or settlements with employers in respect of underdeductions of P.A.Y.E. In the year ended March 31st, 1967, the former amounted to £1,515,934 covering 55,181 cases; the latter amounted to £1,067,177 covering 1,895 cases and including penalties.

The amount of tax remitted on account of poverty, equity, or smallness, together with the amount irrecoverable, was £4,796,198.

Bank Chairmen's Views . . .

THE addresses to their shareholders of the chairmen of the clearing banks are an annual feature of the financial scene and, while they have many topics in common, they provide interesting contrasts in style and comment. On domestic matters Mr John Thomson of Barclays, Sir Richard Summers of the District, and Sir Cuthbert B. Clegg of Martins find common satisfaction in the progress towards total computerization of their customers' accounts and banking records. Likewise, there is an equally evident pleasure in the development of their particular credit card facilities, Mr Thomson noting that new card holders are joining the Barclaycard scheme at the rate of 1,250 per week.

The Government's restrictions on the banks' lending facilities come in for uniform criticism; all the chairmen are concerned with the possible difficulties of meeting their customers' needs as the economy begins to revive. Staff relations crop up in all the addresses and all the chairmen are hopeful that the discussions with the union representatives will prove fruitful. While Sir Richard Summers does not even mention the report of the National Prices and Incomes Board and Sir Cuthbert Clegg merely notes in passing that his bank subscribes to the collective representations on the Board's report, Sir Archibald Forbes, of the Midland, deals at some length with the Board's findings. No one with any feeling for the nuances of the English language could fail to enjoy these paragraphs. Otherwise, Sir Archibald is concerned primarily with the international scene and the future of sterling as well as the difficulties of the U.K. economy and their implications for the banking system.

Mr D. J. Robarts, of the National Provincial, is not optimistic about the outcome of devaluation. He stresses that there has been a loss of confidence in sterling which 'will not be halted until steps (are taken) to produce a balance sheet that stands up to critical analysis'. Mr Harald Peake, of Lloyds, shares the views of his colleagues on devaluation and, like other observers at home and abroad, is uncertain whether 'we have the national resolve and strength of character to make the far-reaching changes that are needed'.

For the Westminster Bank, Mr Duncan Stirling reviews the world trading scene and expresses concern that the restrictive trade policies of Britain and the U.S.A. could adversely affect the volume of world trade. Nor has the devaluation at home made life any easier for Britain and, in common with his colleagues, he is concerned at the difficulties the banks will encounter in meeting the borrowing needs of their customers. All in all, the collective views of the bank chairmen offer little more cheer than the seasonal weather.

...and Bank Mergers

LAST week's announcement of a proposed merger between the National Provincial and Westminster Banks was received with considerable surprise. The secrecy in which these negotiations have been carried on is undoubtedly in the best traditions of the banking world. It is too early as yet to assess the probable results of such a merger, but one obvious possibility is that there will be further mergers. For example, who will be the suitor for the hand of Martins Bank which, on this occasion, seems to have been left on the shelf?

Rather more important, however, are the implications for the employees and operations of the two merging banks. If the full benefits of the merger are to take place there must surely be some streamlining of staff and premises. Clearly this will not be done in the short run but, unless it is done, it is difficult to see what significant benefits can accrue to the banks' customers.

Directors' Budget Recommendations

THE Institute of Directors, in its annual pre-Budget letter to the Chancellor, urges yet again some relief from what it terms the 'insidious and debilitating' taxation on higher earned incomes. The Institute argues that it is not so much a question that people will not continue to work hard, but rather that there is a need for tax relief which will spur them to more intensive efforts. This, it is asserted, can only be brought about by 'worth-while incentives'. Recognizing the Chancellor's political problems were he to accede to such a request, the Institute stresses that he should take a 'courageous attitude'. In one respect at least he and the Institute will be in agreement, i.e. 'the cost of giving such incentives is low, but the prize could be of startling magnitude'.

the Abbott v. Philbin decision in the House of Lords, now proposes that the Chancellor should put forward a new scheme for stock options. This would be based on the American system, the essence of which is that payment of tax on gains on such options is deferred until the stock is sold. An interesting proposal is for the exemption on all transactions giving rise to capital gains if the turnover is £1,000 or less in a year.

The Institute also proposes a graduated rate of capital gains tax ranging from 30 per cent on assets held more than one year but less than two years, to 12 per cent on assets held more than four years. At the same time, it suggests that the overriding limits on contributions to section 22, Finance Act 1956, pension schemes for the self-employed should be revised upwards by 40 per cent to take account of inflation and the general rise in earned incomes.

The Unions on Taxes

THE proposals of the T.U.C. General Council for tax revision in the coming Budget are, not surprisingly, in marked contrast with those of the Institute of Directors. The most important proposal is for a tax on wealth at the rate of 3 per cent on property above £20,000. The T.U.C. estimates that this would yield about £1,000 million a year and asserts further, that the time is overdue for a proper contribution to be made to the Exchequer by the owners of what are described as great concentrations of wealth and property. Such a tax 'would underline the close relationship between incomes policy and social purpose'.

The T.U.C. further proposes that there should be a voluntary limitation on dividend distributions. The Treasury would have to be informed of any proposal to increase dividends and permission to do so would depend on the extent to which the company had contributed to exports, higher investment and regional location as well as increases in issued capital. The administrative complications of such proposals need hardly be stressed. The recent increase in the corporation tax should, in the opinion of the T.U.C., increase the pressure on companies to restrict distributions. If, however, developments show that this is not the case then the restrictive effect should be intensified by increasing the standard and other rates of income tax on unearned incomes, or by raising the rates generally and increasing the earned income allowance. One particular point of interest is the suggestion for tripartite discussions with the Government and the C.B.I. in order to bring a new deal for employees in take-over bids.

End of the Guinea in Sight

N just three years and three weeks' time Britain's currency will be 'going decimal', said Lord Erroll, Deputy Chairman of the Decimal Currency Board, at the luncheon meeting of the London and District Society of Chartered Accountants on Tuesday of last week, 'so you have not got a moment to lose if you are not already considering the matter'.

The controversy over whether there should be a \pounds or a ten-shilling unit was settled by Parliament last summer when the Decimal Currency Bill became an Act, he went on, and no more time should be wasted on arguing the merits of the respective units. The \pounds , claimed Lord Erroll, had a number of very real and substantial advantages – the big companies would not have to change their balance sheets and by retaining the \pounds we were retaining a unit which was familiar. People think in pounds, when buying or selling a house for instance, and it was interesting that in those English-speaking countries which had gone over to a tenshilling unit, people still used the old \pounds for large transactions to avoid making an article look twice as expensive at it really was.

Another advantage of the £ unit was that the florin and the shilling become immediately interchargeable with the ten new-penny piece and five new-penny piece. 'A final point on this subject', said Lord Erroll—'those who levied their charges in guineas had better reconsider their practice, because the guinea will cease to exist as a currency unit—and £1.05 does not look a very snobby sum'. So, he said, amid laughter, it might be better to get away from using the guinea as soon as possible.

Departmental Dispute over Rights of Irish Auditor-General

AMATTER of considerable interest to the profession has recently been under review in Dublin. The all-party Committee of Public Accounts of the Dail has just published an interim report urging the enactment of legislation to enable the Comptroller and Auditor-General to examine any official document that he considers to be necessary for the purpose of exercising his statutory function.

The Comptroller, Mr E. F. Suttle, had complained that he was refused access to certain files by the Department of Justice. The all-party committee heard evidence from both sides, and according to the published minutes of evidence the Secretary of the Department of Justice, Mr P. Berry, explained that there was no question of withholding information. The Comptroller, he said, was not asking for information or explanations but for omnibus access to State files containing, perhaps, information of a highly confidential nature. The principle could not be conceded that the Comptroller could see any document he wished.

The Comptroller said it was his duty to see that money provided by the Dail for public services was spent in accordance with due authority, regularity and efficiency. It was also his duty to draw attention to instances of irregularity, waste, extravagance, fraud or administrative inefficiency.

In his annual report the Comptroller had extended the scope of his audit, with the encouragement of the Committee of Public Accounts, into the field of administrative efficiency, expanding the interpretation of the word 'waste' to this extent. Mr Berry said that the Comptroller had no right to demand papers relating to administration and departmental policy. His proper machinery for ascertaining information was the 'audit query' (or request for specific information) which had never been refused. The Comptroller had no authority, statutory or otherwise, to engage in an inquiry into administrative efficiency. The Secretary of the Department of Finance, giving evidence, stressed that in his department's view the Comptroller should always be facilitated, but that his function should have the sanction of custom and good sense rather than of an express statutory provision.

After considering the evidence the committee stated that 'the proper discharge of the duty placed on the Comptroller . . . requires that such documents as he determines to be necessary for the carrying out of his duties should be made available to him by accounting officers' and recommended the enactment of appropriate legislation.

This is My Life

by An Industrious Accountant

LATER this year we'll be having our hundredth birthday as a formally registered company. We've come a long way since our enterprising young founder – now depicted resplendent in check trousers, gold watch-chains and dundreary whiskers on the board-room wall – opened his little drapery shop where our side entrance is situated today.

Suitable celebrations are now being discussed. The chairman – a direct descendant of the original founder – is taking a particular interest in the various ideas under review. What about a suitable gift for each member of the staff? he asked briskly, one of his pleasanter qualities being a sort of feudal paternalism towards his employees. Brochures or gala sales or advertising campaigns were all very well in their way, he insisted, but the staff must be among the first to be considered.

The principle was welcomed by his co-directors and I must admit to pricking up my own ears rather favourably, but the nature of the suggested gift caused some argument. The natural thing, of course, was money – a week's pay being vaguely hinted at – but Prinny, our personnel director, almost had apoplexy at the thought.

What with the unions, the staff association, and the pensioners all asking for more, like so many famished Oliver Twists, to say nothing of national policy and the Government's injunctions, he couldn't possibly countenance the establishment of such a precedent. Not that it would happen again in his time, of course, he admitted handsomely, but we might easily embarrass other firms in the area.

I stressed that P.A.Y.E. would apply and the chairman, whose views on tax are simple but unprintable, promptly vetoed the idea of a cash payment.

Extra holidays would trigger off chain reactions and shorter hours were too costly, so suitable personal gifts were seen as the only feasible solution. Prinny rather pushed a list of such items as chocolates, bottles of wine or whiskey, or nylons, but the others demurred; too commonplace and uninspiring.

The managing director supported plain gift vouchers as being the simplest answer, but the chairman thought them too impersonal. They'd be taxable, anyhow, I told him, quoting Laidler v. Perry, which clinched that argument. The deputy chairman's hare-brained idea of distributing assorted shirts 'just to help the poor old factory's turnover, dammit' was thrown out with ignominy.

So we concentrated again on the idea of giving presents, adroitly eluding the clutches of those greedy tax vultures (the chairman's expression, not mine) by drafting some fulsome sentiments for the covering letters to emphasize anniversary goodwill, token of high personal esteem, voluntary and ex gratia, without regard or reference to services, etc. The draft letter seemed to be inspired more by legalistic cunning than by fatherly loving kindness at that stage, but the modern-day recipient would be smart enough to appreciate the underlying motive.

The problem, obviously, was to find something that was personal in the sense that it couldn't readily be re-converted into cash. Standard priced articles like cigarettes or branded goods like propelling pencils were automatically suspect. The chairman, still keenly interested, said that old Smith in the tobacconist's shop down the street had given all his male assistants a suit of clothes to mark a recent occasion. True, there weren't many of them, but the precedent looked good.

There was some resultant annoyance between the supporters of good business for our made-to-measure sections and those who felt that complete disorganization would result because of our big establishment, until the tax angle reared its ugly head again. Assessments would be made on the resale or second-hand value of the clothes, I explained, quoting Wilkins v. Rogerson, thanking my stars that I'd had enough advance notice of the issue to enable me to look up the textbooks.

Just then Prinny suggested that a draw for free holidays abroad would be much more acceptable, and why not issue a questionnaire asking for the staff's own preferences? So we deferred further discussion sine die

Financial Planning with a Corporate Financial Model

II - The Methodology of Financial Planning

by A. S. JACKSON, F.C.A., A.A.C.C.A., G. G. STEPHENSON, M.Sc., and E. C. TOWNSEND, B.A.(Econ.), Ph.D.

THE previous article described how a company's financial components can be assembled in such a way that their corporate effect can be seen.

Each batch of computer output will represent a possible financial strategy and to judge the strategy requires a measurement to be taken. Two types of measurement may be obtained at this stage:

- (a) a discrete measurement for each year, e.g. a return on capital employed; and
- (b) the average D.C.F. rate of return for the typical investment that forms part of the asset stock;

but neither provides a financial planner with a yardstick which he can use to say 'This strategy is the best one for my company'. To enable him to do this the word 'best' must be defined. We shall endeavour to provide a definition after considering the financial planning function and its objective.

Financial planning function

The function of financial planning was recently described by Ezra Solomon in an address to the Production Engineering Research Association Conference in May 1967:

'The basic purpose of financial planning is to make sure that capital funds are used wisely. Specifically, financial planning is concerned with providing a systematic answer to three questions. These are:

- (1) In what form should a company hold its assets? Stated more dynamically this question can be rephrased: What specific assets should an enterprise acquire?
- (2) How large should an enterprise be? Again, the question may be rephrased in a more dynamic sense as: What volume of funds should an enterprise commit to expansion in a given year?
- (3) What should be the composition of a company's liabilities? Translated into the dynamic context the question becomes: How should funds acquired in a given year be financed?

'All three questions are closely interrelated. The total volume of financing will be influenced by the kinds of investment opportunities available as well as by conditions affecting the sources from which financing is derived. Similarly, the cost and availability of funds depend in part on the quantity and quality of investment purposes for which they will be used. In other words, the three questions outlined above are really three facets of a single underlying question.'

Solomon's analysis of the function of financial planning has been adapted for the purpose of constructing a financial model. The following paragraphs explain the use made of it in constructing the model.

The heart of the financial planning function in a company is the obtaining of funds and their direction to profitable use in the business. This is a complex operation involving a number of interrelated money systems, such as:

- (1) The flow of funds from the profitability of existing and future investment.
- (2) Interest payments.
- (3) Taxation.
- (4) Investment incentives.
- (5) Finance raising.
- (6) Expectations of the share market.

In turn these sytems are affected by the desired rate of growth, asset life, cash flow and expenditure profiles for investment.

This complex operation has been put together in the model. The model will allow the merits of different planning strategies to be judged through their impact upon the different money systems and finally through their effect upon the interests of the ordinary shareholders. The best planning strategy can be defined provided that the overall objective is defined clearly. When the best strategy has been defined, the planning authority can then determine the most useful statistics for monitoring the application of the selected policy.

As is implied in the last paragraph financial planning therefore involves:

- (a) a recognition of the overall objective;
- (b) the selection of appropriate strategies;
- (c) the monitoring of current performance.

The statement of a planning objective will be followed by the establishment of an optimum strategy. The optimum strategy leads to the establishment of a set of specific targets. These targets for growth, profitability, etc., will be in accordance with the company's objectives. Then the company must select statistics which are sensitive enough to give sensible comparisons of performance in the short-term against the long-term target. Further, the statistics must be accurate enough to allow the planning strategy to be adjusted in response to the changing conditions which they reveal.

Financial planning objective

The overall objective of financial planning will be to provide the 'best' set of answers to the three questions posed by Solomon.

Since the company is operating on behalf of its ordinary shareholders, the definition of 'best' must be phrased in terms of the continuing interests of existing shareholders. A measure of their continuing interests is needed.

Any measure used to appraise the effectiveness of financial planning must value both existing and future profits from the shareholders' point of view. The shareholders' continuing interests include:

- (1) dividends, after allowing for the standard rate of income tax, and
- (2) growth in the market value of shares, after allowing for capital gains tax.

These interests are a stream of receipts (dividends) plus a terminal 'capital profit', and a rate of return may be calculated by a discounting process to give the shareholders' return (S.R.). It is suggested that the financial objective of maximizing this return is a valuable concept and should be used to select the best strategy for a company. For each strategy the model calculates the return that is being provided for the shareholders who invest in the company at the beginning of the planning period and sell at the end of the planning period. The mathematical definition of shareholders' return is shown in Appendix I.

Shareholders' return (S.R.)

Any calculation of S.R. contains, either by design or default, a model of the stock-market. The same can be said for a calculation designed to inform a company of its cost of employing equity finance – a close relative of S.R.

It has been demonstrated by Merrett and Sykes² that shareholders have received, on average, a discounted return of 9 per cent per annum. This is in money terms, after all taxes, and comes from dividends and from growth in the value of investment. After allowing for inflation a return of 7 per cent in real terms was obtained. A discounted yield on equity investment of 9 per cent, being the average yield on equity investment in the past, may be taken as a minimum expectation by existing shareholders. All shareholders hope that their company will exceed this minimum and the company's objective must be to do just that.

Part of the shareholders' return is obtained from an increase in the value of their holdings and, since the objective of financial planning is to maximize the shareholders' return, a suitable method must be found which relates a company's planned performance to the future value of its shares. In the long run a company's financial performance must govern the price of its shares. The simplest possible assumption has been made – that every £1 of retained profits adds £1 to the market value of the shares. This implies that in the long run the market value of shares and their book value will tend to be equal, ignoring the effect of temporary fluctuations in share price.

Although this assumption is widely adopted by theorists, it is difficult to justify by observation; further, the book value of shares is determined from accounting conventions. However, for the limited number of cases that have been examined, it has been found that for realistic planning periods and typical rates of S.R., the value of S.R. is not highly sensitive to the accuracy of this assumption.

For a particular company only a sensitivity analysis applied to the purchasing and selling value of its shares can show whether or not the assumption should be used.

The planning period

Under modern conditions of escalating technology companies are often committed to their capital expenditure strategies for five years ahead and it follows that the planning horizon must be set beyond this partially committed period. As the planning horizon becomes more distant, so the quality of information available for planning decisions must decline. A tenyear planning period has been selected as a reasonable compromise.

Important relationships in financial planning Relationship between growth and profitability

In a growing company financial planning requires both profitability and growth to be considered together.

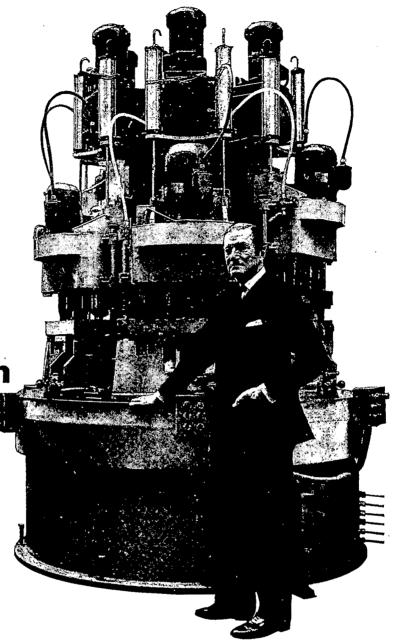

At any point in time, there will be a range of investment opportunities offering different rates of return. The higher the required return, the smaller will be the number of opportunities available to invest at that return. This situation arises because the existing firms in an industry are competing among themselves for a

Formally the objective criterion for financial planning ought to be the maximization of shareholders' wealth (net present worth), using a discount rate which reflects their alternative investment opportunities. This criterion has the practical disadvantages of being less comprehensible to businessmen and requires the precise (risk-adjusted) valuation of the alternatives available. The authors' experience is that for practical purposes the errors arising from the use of S.R. maximization as a criterion are no greater than those arising from an incorrect choice of the appropriate discount rate – which does raise considerable definitional problems in practice. The use of S.R. as the objective measure of acceptability has the added advantage of making comparisons between alternative strategies more easily studied.

Mr. B., Managing Director of a small machine tool company, faced a decision which he, and his Board, had long been postponing. They had a choice which confronts all companies, whether to grow or to stagnate. They chose growth, but this involved obtaining some £70,000 to invest in new plant to produce more purpose built machine tools like the one above.

Like many other small and medium-sized companies in a similar situation, they came to I.C.F.C. We were able to lend the Company the necessary cash just when it was most needed. Repayment terms were tailored to suit the Company's needs—and without any danger of subsequent alterations due to short-term economic fluctuations.

limited number of opportunities, or because newcomers are attracted into an industry by the high number of opportunities that are available. The annual selection from the available opportunities becomes the growth rate.

A limit to growth is set by the amount of finance that is available from the on-going investment, and this is determined by past opportunity selection. In general, one may say, the higher the profitability of past and present operations, the higher will be the potential (desired) growth rate, but to harmonize the two factors is a matter for considerable skill. Figure III illustrates the problem.

The meeting point of the investment opportunity curve with the available finance curve will determine the maximum achievable rate of growth for a company within the opportunities offered by a particular industry.

2. Relationship between the cost of capital and the shareholders' return

A company utilizes three sources of finance. These are:

- (i) new debenture and other loan finance;
- (ii) new equity finance; and
- (iii) retained earnings and depreciation provisions.

A company that has a particular growth will employ a 'capital mix' according to the prevailing financial conditions. It is clear that the 'capital mix' utilized by the company will be significantly affected by the choice of growth rate. For any given level of investment profitability a high growth rate will result in larger annual sums being generated internally for reinvestment, but since there will always be a lag between investment and the receipt of the respective incomes, the relative importance of retained earnings as a source of investment finance must fall as the growth rate increases. This is because the higher the growth rate, the greater will be the ratio of current investment (requiring funds) to past investment (generating funds).

If the growth rate requires additional funds, the efficient company will make use of debt capital first and then share capital if the maximum amount of debt has been raised.

The utilization of funds involves the company in a cost – the providers of funds expect an 'appropriate' reward, so the borrower must earn sufficient to provide the reward. This is the cost of capital and as the 'capital mix' changes (i.e. the growth rate) so does the cost of capital. At some growth rate the cost of capital will have a lowest value and in general this is when the maximum obtainable amount of debt capital has been raised.

This growth rate is very important since it will very often give the maximum shareholders' return.

Although a growth strategy may be the optimum for a given level of investment profitability, this does not ensure that the best return available to shareholders is an acceptable one. Thus if the company can only find investments at a very low level of profitability, there is no rate of growth which will produce acceptable results. The parallel case in orthodox capital budgeting theory is where the minimum cost of capital exceeds the profitability of the available investments. In each of these cases, the company must find more profitable investments or fail to meet shareholders' expectations with dire consequences in the long term.

Monitoring performance in the continuing company

It has been suggested that the primary function of the financial planner is to select the optimum strategy for the company to follow, and that the best strategy maximizes the shareholders' continuing interests and minimizes the cost of capital to the company. The role of the financial planner does not end with the selection of the optimal strategy, for planning is a continuous process of forward appraisal, evaluation of alternatives, choice, and adjustment.

The continuous reappraisal of plans in the light of changing circumstances is an integral part of the planning function. A plan must not become a strait-jacket for future actions, but should provide management with a guiding framework for rational decision taking. It is essential that the planning authority should have a mechanism for feeding back information about the current situation in order to make adjustments to future plans as circumstances change. The primary requirement is for one or more statistics which may be used to monitor current performance.

In choosing a means of monitoring current performance, the statistics need to be:

- (a) sensitive enough to monitor performance in the short term against a long-term target;
- (b) trustworthy enough to allow the planning strategy to be adjusted in response to changing conditions.

Using a financial model helps in this selection of short-term measures. It is especially helpful in assisting the planner to understand the complex relationship between annually calculated statistics, such as return on capital employed and return on net assets, and the long-term performance statistics, such as the share-holders' return – a measure of long-term company performance – and the discounted cash flow return – a long-term measure of the performance of a single plant over its productive life.

No simple rules can be laid down for reconciling the long- and short-term statistics, but a considerable understanding of their complex interrelationship may be obtained by studying the results of a computer modelling exercise.

APPENDIX I

Shareholders' discounted cash flow rate of return

The calculation is as follows:

SR =the solution rate r to the equation

Where S_n = Value of shares in purchase year (n)

c = Rate of capital gains tax (assumed to be half income tax rate)

Di = Dividend year

Ni = New share issue year i r = Discount rate (shareholders' return)

G = Capital gain (accumulated retentions between years n and m)

It therefore assumes that the typical shareholder maintains a representative shareholding at all times. This necessitates his purchasing new shares in proportion to his holding year by year, and at the current market price.

The problem of predicting share prices is, of course, notoriously difficult. One of the major reasons is that the market assesses a share according to expectations about future earnings and dividends which are based on inadequate information. Owing to the action of numerous influences upon these expectations, share prices are subject to short-term fluctuations which are too great to reflect changes in the real value of the company.

The simplest possible assumption has been made about the terminal value of shares held. It is that every £1 retained by the company in the form of undistributed profits adds £1 to the market valuation of the company. This implies that in the long run the market value and the book value of shares will tend to be equal. The effects of temporary fluctuations in the share prices have been ignored. Other assumptions could be made, but it is difficult to see a better one at this time.

TAXATION IN PRACTICE

How to Avoid and Why

by B. D. EASLICK, F.T.I.I.

SECTION 77 of the Finance Act 1965 states that where the 'distributions' of a 'close company' fall short of the 'required standard', an assessment shall be made in respect of the shortfall equal to income tax at the standard rate.

Having established that we have a 'close company', the first step in the computation under this section is to work out the 'required standard'. This is calculated in accordance with the rules in the seventh paragraph of the Eighteenth Schedule, Finance Act 1965, and we find that we have to start with 'the amount on which corporation tax falls finally to be borne, less the amount of that tax'.

Therefore, it follows that (assuming no franked investment income (F.I.I.) or group income) if there are no profits on which corporation tax falls finally to be borne, there can be no shortfall. It is important to observe that this does not restrict the calculation to the results of the year, but allows for the offset of past losses etc. which are deducted from the profits of the year before arriving at the amount on which corporation tax falls finally to be borne.

However, going back to our calculation again, we have arrived at a figure of chargeable profits less corporation tax thereon. We now have to add the other income which has not borne corporation tax, i.e. F.I.I. and group income.

The next point to notice is that we now deduct the net chargeable gains (i.e. the total chargeable gains less the corporation tax thereon). Thus we are allowed to keep the chargeable gains without any immediate penalty for non-distribution. I say immediate, because if these are not distributed the net gain will be represented by increased assets and so increase the value of the shares on which a capital gains tax liability could arise to the individual shareholder.

We now deduct the net 'estate or trading income' and arrive at the distributable investment income. From this we are allowed to deduct either 10 per cent of the net estate or trading income, or £200, whichever is the lesser amount.

The maximum required standard is now made up of the aggregate of the figure just calculated plus 60 per cent of the net estate or trading income. This 60 per cent is calculated on the net estate or trading income after abatement, if applicable. Abatement only applies where the company is a trading company which has no associated company and where the net estate or trading income is less than £9,000. The relief is one-fifth of the amount required to make the estate or trading income up to £9,000, but where the net estate or trading income is less than £1,500, no distribution of this part of the income is required.

Next we have to consider what distributions have been made relating to this period. Schedule 18, Finance Act 1965, provides that distributions consist of:

- (1) dividends and other distributions for the accounting period paid in the accounting period;
- (2) dividends and other distributions for the accounting period paid within twelve months after the end of the accounting period;
- (3) dividends and other distributions paid in the accounting period but not for the accounting period, and not related back on account of being within twelve months of the previous accounting period; and
- (4) excess directors' remuneration which has been disallowed in the computation of profits.

If the total of these distributions falls short of the required standard, a shortfall assessment may be made on the difference. At first sight this may not seem too serious a consequence but there are two very important reasons why a shortfall should not be allowed to occur.

The first of these is that section 78 states that where an assessment has been made on a trading company in respect of a shortfall, the income of the company may be apportioned for surtax. Whilst apportionment does not follow automatically, it is more than likely to happen. This possibility can be avoided in the case of a trading company by not allowing a shortfall to occur since subsection 4 makes it clear that where no shortfall arises there cannot be a surtax apportionment.

The second reason is that section 77 (6) states that where an over distribution is made in a later accounting period, it may be possible to recover the tax paid on a prior showfall. In point of fact, however, there is only a slender chance of ever recovering the full amount of the tax already paid as we shall now see.

First of all, a prior shortfall can only be recovered if:

- (1) the company continues in existence; and
- (2) it remains a close company; and
- (3) further distributions exceed the required standards.

Secondly, the actual distributions of the second period must be considered. If they include any disallowable directors' remuneration the prior shortfall must be apportioned between the disallowable directors' remuneration and the dividends, then two further limitations apply:

The allowance for the prior shortfall must not reduce the current distribution below:

- (1) the required standard for the current year; and
- (2) the amount of the disallowable directors' remuneration for the current year.

Having applied these two restrictions, then the amount of the prior shortfall finally apportioned to disallowed directors' remuneration in the current year is lost for ever. The only relief is in respect of the fraction apportioned to the dividends in the current period, but the amount of prior shortfall available to carry forward to a further period is reduced by both the fraction applicable to the dividends, and the fraction applicable to the directors' remuneration.

How then do we avoid this disastrous state of affairs? Clearly it is best to avoid a shortfall and it is suggested that this is done as follows:

- (1) Speed up the preparation of the accounts so that they are completed reasonably soon after the year-end. The shortfall position can then be calculated and provision made for directors' remuneration and dividends to cover.
- (2) The accounts should then be adopted in general meeting.
- (3) Note in the directors' report that the company is a close company and that no provision has been made in respect of income tax on a shortfall because the directors are of the opinion that no shortfall arises because . . . (state the reasons given). This will add weight when the accounts are in the hands of the Inland Revenue.
- (4) The accounts and directors' report can be submitted to the Inspector of Taxes with a request for a clearance. The inspector then has three months to decide whether he requires further particulars or whether he will take action on a shortfall and the company will be able to see whether any adjustment to the shortfall position has become necessary by reason of the fact that perhaps some adjustments have had to be made to the original computations, and some previously claimed expenses added back.
- (5) The company then has up to the anniversary of the accounting date to declare a dividend or additional dividend for the period, thus avoiding a shortfall assessment.

As a general rule it will nearly always be better to vote additional directors' remuneration rather than pay a dividend. The directors' remuneration will not be allowed as a deduction from profits but neither will the dividend, and the directors' remuneration gives the benefit of earned income relief unless this has already been fully absorbed elsewhere.

It is not better to vote directors' remuneration rather than a dividend when you are trying to recover a prior shortfall.

Netherlands Accountants' Conference

First Accountants' Day of New Statutory Body

THE birth of the new Nederlands Instituut van Registeraccountants on March 6th last gave a new constitution to the profession in the Netherlands, but this was not permitted to change the custom of holding an annual 'Accountants' Day' so long maintained by its founders, the Nederlands Instituut van Accountants.

The Accountants' Day in November would have been the fiftieth in the old series; instead it became the first of the new Institute. The conference was presided over by Mr A. F. Tempelaar, last President of the former Institute and the first President of the new Institute of Register-accountants. The opening session was attended by His Royal Highness Prince Claus of the Netherlands, the Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, Drs L. J. M. van Son, and the Under-Secretary of State for Home Affairs, Mr C. van Veen, with members of the First and Second Chambers of the States-General.

Over a thousand members of the new Netherlands Institute were present together with representatives of the profession from Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Great Britain and Ireland, Luxembourg, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States of America. From the British Isles were the Presidents and Secretaries of the English and Scottish and Irish Institutes and of The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants.

The first paper — of general and economic interest — was given by Dr J. R. M. van den Brink, formerly Minister of Social Affairs and now a director of the Amsterdam-Rotterdam Bank, on 'Anti-cyclical economic policy in the Netherlands; its purpose, principles, possibilities and limits'. The paper of professional interest was entrusted to Professor Drs R. Burgert, of the Netherlands School of Economics at Rotterdam, who spoke on 'Economic business principles acceptable for annual accounts'. His address was topical since, following the report of the Verdam Committee, it is likely that annual accounts in Holland may become regulated by law.

President's address

In the course of his opening address, Mr A. F. Tempelaar referred to the bringing into effect on the Registered Accountants Act on March 6th, 1967, and through it the statutory regulation of the accountancy profession in the Netherlands. For Dutch accountants themselves, said Mr Tempelaar, the statutory regulation could be regarded as a consolidation of what had been created over past decades voluntarily and with great devotion and with personal sacrifices. The events last year were the prelude to a new era for the profession. As a public body the new Order had been entrusted with social tasks that could not be assigned to private organizations. Section 22 of the Registered Accountants Act, for example, ruled that the Council of the Order should advise the Government either on request or of its own accord, on all matters relating to the Order and the conduct of the profession; these matters were numerous and

The profession, continued Mr Tempelaar, was confronted with many problems; both nationally and internationally. The accountant's training, whether a university training or not, provided the basis for obtaining as well as maintaining the skill that was required in their practical work. The rapidity of the changes which now occurred necessitated that more and more attention should be given to courses and conferences to enable the qualified accountant to acquire indispensable additional knowledge.

Anti-cyclical Economic Policy in the Netherlands (The effort to achieve balanced growth)

In his address to the conference Dr J. R. M. van den Brink said that in the post-war period anti-cyclical economic policy – defined as the effort to achieve balanced economic growth – had occasionally gone wrong both in the Netherlands and in other countries.

The economy of the Netherlands was closely bound to other countries – one-third of the Dutch production being exported. Current monetary reserves, including gold and foreign currency and drawing rights on the International Monetary Fund, were sufficient to cover fourteen weeks' imports. It followed, therefore, that Holland had to give strict priority to keeping its external transactions in balance; if the monetary reserves fell, the country would become too much dependent on foreign credits or help in some other form

In the Dutch context, it could be stated that the purpose of anti-cyclical policy was tripartite, i.e. the so-called magic triangle of full employment, foreign payments equilibrium and internal price stability. In view of the close international ties of the Dutch economy, maintenance of external equilibrium certainly deserved a high place in the scale of priorities.

Anti-cyclical economic policy was now far more intricate than it was prior to the First World War. It was now consciously aiming at all the elements of the magic triangle; moreover, it was no longer restricted to the use of monetary instruments only. Budget policy, wage policy and price policy were some of the most important components besides monetary policy.

The primary basis of anti-cyclical policy was the fact that production was organized by enterprises in which decisions – both individual and collective – were made by employers, employees, consumers and investors. Any economic policy that was not conscious of the profit motive was foredoomed to fail. The rate of earnings – calculated by relating actual earnings to the replacement value of the capital employed in the enterprise – and expectations of future earnings took a central place in the economic system and fundamentally affected employment. In periods of hesitant economic growth, a realistic economic policy would only in the very last resort justify measures that led, even initially, to a further decline in earnings. Co-ordinated use of the available instruments might be designated as a secondary basis.

The close international links of the Dutch economy – in which the labour of at least 1½ million workers out of an economically active population of some 4½ million went to exports – set definite limits; the Netherlands could not maintain an anti-cyclical policy on its own for any length of time. Their possibilities were largely determined by the economic situation of their main trading partners, e.g. Germany, Belgium-Luxembourg and Britain, who took respectively 26, 15 and 9 per cent of Dutch exports, and by their economic policies. Good international co-ordination of economic policies consequently was of great importance to the Netherlands. Regrettably, this still was in its infancy.

Monetary and budget policy

Monetary policy, said Dr van den Brink, certainly had been the most important and the most effective component of the anti-cyclical economic policy mix. Through bank rate policy, open market policy, cash reserve policy and credit restriction policy, it influenced domestic demand by way of regulating liquidity supply. However, monetary policy could not achieve its purpose without adequate support from other instruments of economic policy. For instance, if labour cost rose faster than capital goods prices, the inclination to invest in depth would be stimulated to such an extent that rising interest rates would hardly be able to check the flood of investment. Such wage developments would moreover push up the price level, brake exports, encourage imports, upset the external equilibrium and lead to a downward revision of entrepreneurs' earnings forecasts, and would in consequence induce a downturn in the economic cycle.

In the recent past, the inadequate support from other policy instruments had also resulted in credit restriction policies being continued for no less than about three and a half years, regardless of all the undesirable effects on the banking system.

Certainly, the liquidity ratio had declined substantially; from the point of view of anti-cyclical policy, monetary policy obviously was effective. In regard to stabilization of the domestic price level, the scope of monetary policy in the Netherlands was limited. They could not steer clear of developments in the countries of their main trading partners. The arguments in favour of a system of floating exchange rates had to be rejected out of hand. The solution should rather be sought in the extension of international co-ordination of anti-cyclical economic policies, as they were unsuitable for a country living by international trade, and the European Commission had spoken out for the maintenance of fixed exchange.

Budget policy was a far younger component of anti-cyclical economic policy. Though without doubt its potentialities were great (the central Government's 1966 expenditure amounted to about 27.5 per cent of national income), few results had been obtained from it in the Netherlands during the post-war years — either from expenditure policy, tax policy, or from debt management policy — all of which could be regarded as potential forms of anti-cyclical policy.

Prices and incomes

Wage policy was fundamentally of even greater importance in anti-cyclical policy than budget policy. However, it could hardly be maintained that it had been fully used as an instrument of economic policy. So far, wage developments had almost exclusively been determined by the degree of tension on the labour market. Time and again this had led to shifts in income distribution by contracting for wage rises in excess of productivity rises, at the expense of the rate of earnings in many enterprises.

The Government's price policy had by and large fulfilled its task in anti-cyclical policy. Its greatest effect was achieved in times of shortages. It had to be expected that monetary policy would remain the centre of gravity of the Netherlands's anti-cyclical economic policy in the near future. Budget policy and wage policy could only play a greater role in the management of the economy if the social and political leadership achieved a clearer understanding of the interdependence of economic phenomena and a better co-ordination based on it. Under those conditions it might also be expected that the harmful side-effects of an overdose of monetary controls (such as excessively high interest rates in periods of expansion) would be kept at a minimum.

Finally, it was advisable to study the system of 'contingency budgets' that had recently been introduced in Germany, in order to speed up budget policy reaction and to give it greater flexibility in periods of hesitant economic growth.

Economic Business Principles Acceptable for Annual Accounts

Dutch accountant criticises replacement value theory

Addressing the conference on 'Economic business principles acceptable for annual accounts', Professor Drs R. Burgert, Professor of Business Economics and Accountancy at the Netherlands School of Economics at Rotterdam, said the fact the legislators in several countries were making or renewing legal regulations for published annual accounts had created renewed interest in the economic problem of how to determine profits.

In Germany and in Austria, a new Aktiengesetz came into operation on January 1st, 1966; in France the Code des Sociétés' began on April 1st, 1967; in England there was the new Companies Act 1967 coming into force on various dates. In contrast to what most legislators in other countries did, the Verdam Committee's draft Bill for the Netherlands did not mention specific regulations for the determination of profits or the valuation of balance sheet items. As a substitute for these regulations the Verdam Committee gave a broad general rule prescribing that assets and liabilities should be valued on the basis of 'standards considered acceptable in business'.

Hitherto it had been the rule that the annual financial statement should be drawn up according to 'sound business practice', and many people believed that in the draft Bill this vague rule had merely been replaced by another similarly vague. There were accountants who would like the legislator to lay down that the annual accounts should be drawn up 'in conformity with business economic principles'. They understood this to mean the rules derived from the theory of replacement value, which for the ascertainment of profits proceeded from the objective that the calculation of the 'spendable income' was based on the condition that the source of income was to be maintained. Outside Holland this theory had received little recognition, either in literature or in practice. In Holland, too, its application in practice was rather limited.

This theory of profit determination had been a much discussed subject among Dutch managerial economists in the past ten years. The chief arguments against the theory will be dealt with. The resultant conclusion is that the basis of valuation and technique of calculation advised by the theory fail to achieve its purpose.

Conservation of the enterprise involves subjective decisions

If conservation of the enterprise as source of income was to be the aim, anything like an objective calculation of profits was out of the question. On the contrary, subjective managerial decisions would unavoidably govern the computation of profits. It is, therefore, submitted that it would be inadvisable for the legislator to include the economic principles for the determination of profits derived from the theory of replacement value in the proposed new law on annual accounts. In the recently renewed legislation on annual accounts in Germany and Britain nothing could be found that was similar to the economic principles of replacement values. The same applies to the generally accepted accounting principles applied to annual accounts in the U.S.A.

The shortcomings of the accounting principles have indeed been a matter of discussion for many years, but the desirability of applying replacement values which was characteristic of what is meant by 'economic principles' among Dutch accountants is not prominent. The aspect which is given special attention is the question whether the assumption that the purchasing power of money remains unchanged – which is of importance when drawing up an annual account – is still tenable.

The discussion has produced no further results yet but the recommendation to publish, in addition to the annual accounts prepared in the traditional manner, a supplementary statement in which all figures are expressed in monetary units of the same purchasing power with the aid of an index reflecting the changes in the purchasing power of money. These ideas, however, have hardly been put into practice so far and the purchasing power adjustments mentioned before do not affect the application of the accounting principles; these retain their significance.

Efforts aimed at introducing the economic concept of profit as a substitute all seem to be bound to fail, said Professor Burgert, as the economic concept of profit cannot be approached except in a very subjective manner. When income is defined as the amount that can be spent without being in a worse position in future, it will be clear that subjective expectations as to the revenue and expenditure in future are decisive elements. Such a concept of income, however great its significance may be for making economic decisions, is unfit for use when drawing up annual accounts.

In the well-known theory evolved by Edward and Bell, the above has been a reason not to postulate the calculation of 'subjective profit' as aim of the annual accounts. Instead emphasis is laid on the significance of accounting data for making decisions and judging decisions made in the past. The annual accounts are of significance for this judgement, especially an external judgement. The determination of the distributable profit is not postulated at all as aim of the annual accounts: this requires a separate managerial decision. Nor is the composition of the annual accounts aimed at maintaining intact stocks of capital goods or equity capital.

Accounting for current costs

The function of the annual account is thus confined to presenting a view of the outcome of managerial decisions made in the period under review. For this reason current costs perform an important function, while the old realization principle is set aside for the ascertainment of holding gains which are also called cost savings. Leaving many details out of consideration, all this would produce the following fundamental form for the profit and loss account for a period of rising prices:

Sales Cost of goods sold on the basis of current costs	,
Current operating profit Realizable cost savings or holding gains
Profit	,

The balance sheet in line with this account is, of course, completely based on current costs.

If, in addition, the influence of price changes is to be reflected in the annual accounts, the ascertainment of current costs threatens to have a considerable subjective impact on the annual accounts, particularly in respect of those goods purchased which are not readily marketable. For the sake of maintaining the objectivity of the annual accounts it would be advisable to use for such assets officially calculated price index numbers with the aid of which historical costs can be converted into current costs. These index numbers would also enable smaller firms to draw up an annual account on the basis of current costs.

Managerial aims and profit determination

The dilemma arising when determining periodical profits lies in the fact that on the one hand the calculation of the profit should show the outcome of the policy pursued, and on the other hand this calculation is used for the purpose of realizing certain managerial aims.

The objectivity of the annual account threatens to suffer by these managerial aims. In theory and practice several systems for the determination of profits which have different managerial aims, can be distinguished. The chief managerial aims are:

- (1) maintaining intact the invested capital;
- (2) maintaining stocks of current and fixed capital goods;
- (3) expressing the capital in monetary units of equal purchasing power;

• (4) maintaining intact the entire enterprise as source of income.

In theory and practice the following systems for the determination of profits aimed at realizing each of these aims – almost exactly or approximately – are available:

- Application of the old rule of cost or market whichever the lower.
- (2) For current capital goods the LIFO system and the base stock system, and for current as well as fixed capital goods the system of replacement cost; under the latter, in the case of price increases, these capital goods are presented in the balance sheet at replacement cost, without affecting the profit and loss account, the increases in value being credited to a revaluation account in so far as they relate to 'normal' stocks.
- (3) For this aim the decrease in buying power of the company's share capital can either be charged in one amount to the profit and loss account or all items in the annual accounts can be converted with the aid of an index number which reflects the changes in the purchasing power of money.
- (4) This aim maintaining intact the enterprise as source of income is the actual objective of the theory of replacement value as formulated in Holland. For the realization of this objective in a dynamic economy, however, one should disregard the stocks of capital goods which the enterprise has actually available and direct one's attention to the stocks of capital goods expected to be required in future to acquire the same income and on the other hand to the sources out of which the capital required for their being financed can be obtained.

Functions of annual accounts

Making an attempt to draw up an annual account which does not violate the three functions to be performed by it too much and on the other hand enables the management of an enterprise to realize the maintenance aim of its choice, it will be examined whether and in how far this conservation aim or the systems for the determination of profit based on it have effects on the functions to be performed by the annual accounts for publication purposes. In brief, these functions are as follows:

- (a) with the aid of the annual accounts it is ascertained which amount will be available for distribution among the participators in the profit (shareholders, recipients or supervisory directors, or directors' fees and - a future participator in the profit - the personnel);
- (b) with the aid of the annual accounts (and the annual report) the management of the enterprise renders account of the policy pursued;
- (c) with the aid of the annual accounts (and the annual report) the capital market obtains information to support it in its function of selecting the best channels for the allocation of scarce capital resources.

The systems for the determination of profits mentioned under (1), (2) and (3) above, seem acceptable in respect of the first function because they do not affect the actual basis of the calculation to a very considerable extent.

For the system mentioned under (2), which is based on replacement cost, the use of officially calculated index figures may be an important contribution to maintaining its objectivity. The system mentioned under (4) is based on subjective estimates to such a great extent that it should be considered in conflict with the first function of the annual accounts.

The systems mentioned under (1), (2) and (3), but excluding the system of replacement cost for a moment, show shortcomings in respect of the second and third functions of the annual accounts because no proper account is taken of price changes or because these price changes are not shown properly. The consequences of decisions made in the past — especially investment and purchase decisions — are, therefore, shown insufficiently. Holding gains because of price rises, for example, are evident only after realization and, if so, mostly merged into operating profit. Because of the valuation of assets at obsolete prices, the balance sheet picture is also open to criticism. For fixed assets these shortcomings preponderate.

Replacement costs

The system of replacement cost deserves separate treatment because it registers actual price changes, though without influencing the profit and loss account for this purpose as far as 'normal stocks' are concerned. Therefore, the balance sheet picture is better than when the other systems for the determination of profits in this group are used. For the system of replacement cost and the base stock system, it is necessary to determine the volume of 'normal stocks'. It is true that then a subjective element influences the calculation, but not too much importance should be attached to this. Problems also arise in the case of non-identical replacement, but efforts have already been made to find an acceptable solution.

The system mentioned under (4), which aims at the conservation of the enterprise as source of income, has such a considerable impact of subjective factors that it seems unacceptable for the first function of the annual accounts. This is also an objection with regard to the second function, the rendering of account. As regards the third function the system may have the advantage that it allows influence to expectations as to the future. With respect to this system in particular one may wonder whether an auditor can indeed provide the annual accounts with an auditor's report briefly saying that it is correct.

Finally, an attempt is made to find a way out of the dilemma. We would suggest taking as a basis the annual accounts as suggested by Edwards and Bell. Their annual accounts perform the second and third functions properly. They show clearly the size and composition of the capital in so far as it consists of material assets and at the same time the consequences of price changes; the profit and loss account shows the total increase of capital split up into the sources from which the increase arose; current operating profit and results of holding assets. But showing the distributable profit — the first function of the annual financial statement — is not given proper attention.

This problem could be solved by extending the profit and loss account with a separate section stating, on the basis of the conservation aim selected by the enterprise, those contributions required for this purpose under the corresponding system for the determination of profit, to be chosen by the enterprise as well. With the exception of the system mentioned under (4), which aims at the conservation of the enterprise as source of income, these amounts can be calculated in a reasonably objective way.

Conservation of stocks and fixed assets

Assuming that the enterprise selects a system for the determination of profits aimed at the conservation of normal stocks and fixed assets, the following fundamental form for the profit and loss account could be suggested:

r. Sales	• • •	• •	• •	• •
2. Cost of goods sold	on the bas	is of c	urrent	cost
Current operati	ng profit
3. Increase in value Increase in value			• •	• •
Total - increase	e of capita	ıl
4. Less: Non-distrib increase for con	servation	of	the ca	pital normal stocks fixed assets			• •	••
•				***************************************
5. Less: Provision for	taxation	• •		••
Distributable p	rofit	• •	• •	• •
6. Proposed retention financing	on of pro	ofit fo	r inte	rnal
7. Profit available for	distributi	ion		• •
It is obvious that the	e items a	and a	are no	t equal b	ecance

It is obvious that the items 3 and 4 are not equal because item 3 relates to actual stocks, and item 4 to the stocks to be maintained intact. In this system the balance sheet is, of course, based on current cost.

It may be considered whether in this way the dilemma in the determination of profits can be solved in an acceptable manner. The section including items r to 3 inclusive of the profit and loss account is of significance for the second and third functions of the annual accounts; in the remaining part the distributable profit, the aim of the first function of the annual accounts, is shown in accordance with the selected conservation aim and the system of profit determination based on it. For this annual financial statement the accountant could provide a conditional certificate, the economic part of which could be formulated in the present case as follows:

'We certify that the annual accounts of XYZ for the financial year . . . have been drawn up in accordance with the accounting principles mentioned in the explanatory notes, which rest on the main lines of the policy aiming at the conservation of current and fixed capital goods selected by the enterprise. Considering these principles and also the legal regulations the annual accounts give an acceptable view of the policy pursued; more in particular the profit and loss account and the balance sheet give a true and fair view of the size and composition of the distributable profit on the one hand and the composition of the company's capital on the other hand.'

For this formulation we have taken the view that the explanatory notes to the annual accounts not only sum up the rules of valuation applied but also explain the policy of conservation selected.

The accountant should, of course, see to it that there is correspondence between the policy of conservation selected and the system of profit determination applied. It stands to reason that the above suggestion, which is meant for further discussion, has not the pretension to raise or solve all problems relating to the annual accounts. Many problems – and this is inevitable in a paper like this – have not been dealt with.

I believe that it is practically inconceivable that the science of managerial economics should have produced uniform economic principles for the determination of profits. The position is rather that more systems for the determination of profits can be distinguished because more conservation aims can be pursued. The theorist cannot say which aim is right and which is wrong. Therefore I am inclined to state to those who believe that uniform economic principles for the calculation of profits do exist or could be formulated that it would probably be more efficient to proceed from the idea that different concepts of profit for 'different purposes' are conceivable.

AUSTRALIA

Australian Society's New Building at Melbourne

BEFORE a distinguished audience representing the Government, the professions, commerce and industry, a new building for the Australian Society of Accountants at 49 Exhibition Street, Melbourne, was recently opened by Mr J. G. Gorton, Prime Minister of Australia (then Minister of Education and Science).

Known as 'Accountants House', the new building will provide members of the Society with considerably improved services, including a larger library, a spacious meeting room and several smaller rooms for seminars and discussion meetings.

In the course of his address at the opening ceremony, Mr Gorton referred to the distinguished history of the Society and went on to speak about the Society's training requirements for entry to the profession. He then commented on the enormous part played by accountants in Australian business life – accountants not only record the past, he said, but show what is being profitably employed in an organization and where there are new avenues which could create new growth; they also provide expert guidance to ensure that capital invested in new developments is invested to the best end.

As a memento of the occasion, the Society's President, Mr H. L. Irving, presented Mr Gorton with a reproduction of a scene in a seventeenth century counting house.

NEW ZEALAND

Asian and Pacific Accounting Conference

ACCOUNTANTS from fourteen countries including Australia, Canada, India, Japan, Pakistan and the United States, will be attending the fifth Asian and Pacific Accounting Conference to be held at Wellington and Christchurch, New Zealand, from February 13th to 21st, under the auspices of the New Zealand Society of Accountants.

The conference will be in two parts – the first in Wellington, from February 13th to 17th, and the second in Christchurch, from February 18th to 21st – and will cover a wide range of subjects and problems relating to the profession. Five technical sessions will be held in Wellington dealing with: "The accountants' role in a developing economy;

'Improvement in accounting standards throughout the world and the ethical basis of the profession'; 'Accounting as an aid to efficient agriculture'; 'Functions of accounting societies', and 'Future developments in accounting'. In Christchurch there will be two technical sessions on 'The common body of knowledge required of the accountant in the next decade' and 'Means and methods of professional education and training'.

Mr S. J. Pears, F.C.A., a member of the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, will be among a number of 'observers' at the conference. Also attending will be Mr Percy F. Hughes, Editor-in-Chief of The Accountant, who will be one of the speakers at the session on the functions of accounting societies.

An interesting social programme for delegates and their ladies will include an opening reception; a visit to Lincoln Agricultural College model farm; a conducted tour of Canterbury University followed by a reception given by the University's Student Union; sightseeing tours and a promenade concert.

ZAMBIA

Decimal Currency Introduced

THE change-over to decimal currency in Zambia was officially introduced on January 16th. The present currency system is now based on the Kwacha which is equivalent to the former Zambian 10s and is divided into 100 ngwee.

The notes are: K.10 (£5), K.2 (£1), K.1 (10s) and a new note of 50 ngwee (5s). Coins are in 20 (2s), 10 (1s), 5 (6d), 2 and 1 ngwee denominations. The two latter coins have no exact equivalent in the former currency. The existing 6d, 1s and 2s coins will be interchangeable until their withdrawal later with the 5, 10, and 20 ngwee. Zambia's $\frac{1}{2}d$, 1d and 3d pieces have no exact equivalent with the new coinage and will be legal tender only in amounts of 6d or multiples thereof.

SWEDEN

Budget Changes

SWEDEN'S State Budget for the fiscal year 1968-69, presented at the opening of the Riksdag on January 11th, shows total expenditure on the operating and capital budgets of Kr.38,535 million and revenue at Kr.36,386 million. This leaves a deficit, or central Government borrowing requirement, of Kr.2,149 million. The deficit is somewhat less than that of the revised Budget for the current fiscal year.

The expenditure policy of the 1968-69 Budget has two primary aims, it is said in the Finance Bill. One is to continue the large and expensive programme of reform that has been initiated in central areas of welfare and social development. The other concerns the concentration of new efforts on such matters as employment and security for wage-earners, support for families with children and assistance to developing countries. In order to realize these aims, it has been necessary to restrict expenditure in other fields.

On the revenue side, the Finance Bill foreshadows a number of changes in indirect taxation. The Government will thus propose that the present 10 per cent general sales tax be converted into an added value tax as from January 1st, 1969. Since this measure would involve a loss of central Government revenue of about Kr.240 million in the fiscal year 1968-69, it is further proposed to introduce a special wage bill tax of 1 per cent as from the same date which would offset this loss. A 10 per cent increase in taxes on wines and spirits from February 5th, 1968, is estimated to yield Kr.200 million. At the same time it is proposed to grant a 10 per cent tax deduction for private investment in machinery in 1968 to an estimated value of Kr.150 million. The net effect of this redistribution of indirect taxation would thus result in an increased revenue of Kr.50 million.

For a full year, tax relief for the business community and public enterprise as a result of the abolition of general sales tax is calculated at about Kr.900 million. There would be a compensation of some Kr.160 million through the extension of the field of taxation under the value added tax, while Kr.725 million would accrue from the wage bill tax.

Altogether, central Government spending will increase by close on Kr.2,400 million, or 6.5 per cent, in the fiscal year 1968-69. Nearly one-third of this increase is ascribable to education and research which will rise to Kr.7,080 million. Besides higher grant-in-aid to the comprehensive school system, higher secondary schools and universities, appropriations to research councils will increase by 15 per cent. A further stimulus to technical development is provided by the setting up of a Government-owned development company.

UNITED STATES

Compatibility of Auditing and Management Services

MR ARTHUR A. SCHULTE, Jr., C.P.A., thinks that the American Institute's ethics committee acted on its own assumption rather than inquiry when it stated categorically, in Opinion No. 12, that the rendering of management services by the auditor would not suggest any conflict of interest to a reasonable observer. He observes in The Journal of Accountancy for December that there are potential conflicts of interest where the C.P.A. performs both auditing and management services for the same client.

On the other hand, Mr Frank J. Hoenemeyer, Executive Vice-President, Investments, of the Prudential Insurance Co of America, thinks that the rendering of management services by C.P.A.s could, not would, lead to loss of independence, the biggest problem being that C.P.A.s are selected and paid by the management on whom they are supposed to check. He emphasizes that the management consultants do all management services except make the final decision, which is made by management. He is more concerned with the flexibility of accounting principles in regard to which the C.P.A. can be under great pressure from the management which hired him.

Mr Malcolm M. Devore, C.P.A., of Messrs Haskins & Sells in New York, chairman of the ad hoc committee of the American Institute on independence, would have the C.P.A. who is going to render management services which appear to involve a material business decision first get approval of the engagement and scope from the company's audit committee. He thinks that the C.P.A.s should report periodically to the audit committee all services rendered, so that all the cards are on the table. This should be before the audit committee recommends to the board of directors whether or not the firm shall be reappointed as auditors.

Adams (Durham) Ltd

AVING in the past two weeks drawn attention to the accounts of companies anticipating the operation of the Companies Act 1967, this week's salutary exercise is to consider the accounts of a company drawn up to satisfy the conditions of the Companies Act 1948 and very little else. The company is Adams (Durham) Ltd and the reprint shows only too well the form in which the accounts are presented.

Barring the usual detail of the board, secretary and registered office, auditors, registrars and share transfer office and bankers, given inside the front cover of the report, the notice of meeting on the facing page, and the report of the directors and the auditors' report, the reprint covers everything else in the report. There is no indication of what the company does - it is even extremely difficult to gather that information from the directors' report and there is no list of subsidiaries, no indication of directors' interests in the company, and no historical record.

To some readers it may seem surprising that, in this more enlightened age of company reporting, there are companies which present their report and accounts in this way. But it can be said that Adams (Durham) is not necessarily an isolated example of this kind of company reporting. There are very many examples that could be provided, although their number is admittedly lessening.

Sharp reverse

Adams (Durham) is in fact in the confectionery business. According to the statistical reference card on the company, Adams makes toffees and confectionery under the 'Dee Cee' trade name but manufacturing has now apparently ceased. A controlling interest in Andrew Buchanan & Sons Ltd was acquired in 1956 and the balance in 1957. Somportex Ltd and Coral Confectionery Ltd were taken over in February 1961, and in October 1966 the works and business at Stockton were sold.

In their report with the 1966-67 accounts - the report being dated November 29th against the April 30th accounting date - the directors state that losses arising out of the closing of the Stockton works proved to be £13,500 more than had been expected, and despite excellent results achieved by the Somportex subsidiary in connection with the 1966 Christmas season, the profitability of non-seasonal lines suffered a sharp reverse in the latter part of the trading year.

In addition, the directors say, 'the Gingham Kitchen Restaurant has continued to make losses and though these have been reduced it has been thought prudent to write off the fixed assets of the subsidiary concerned'. As a result, the accounts show a trading loss for the year, as well as heavy losses on capital account.

As the accounts show, no final dividend was paid, leaving the dividend at the 5d a share interim, and the board admits that 'the decision to pay an interim dividend a year ago is now seen to have been a mistake'. When the decision was made the directors had before them draft accounts of the companies in the group which showed that earnings were sufficient to cover all known or estimated losses and the dividend.

It was not foreseen that difficulties would later arise from the fact that not only was the sale of the non-seasonal lines, previously so successful, greatly reduced in the later months but very large quantities of those lines which, because of their earlier popularity had been taken and paid for by wholesalers, were returned. Under the terms of supply frequently used in the confectionery trade and adopted for these particular goods, full credit had to be given for them while the goods themselves had to be realized at the best available prices.

The loss in both connections was aggravated by the failure of a supplier to fulfil a contract for a special line of similar goods, which proved successful in the hands of a competitor. Liability has been admitted by the supplier, the directors state, and a claim for adequate compensation is being pressed. As no accurate assessment of the amount which may be received can be made, nothing is included for the claim in the accounts.

Written off

The directors' report goes on to state that some goods had been returned in the first half of the year, part of which related to deliveries made prior to April 30th, 1966, so that it has been necessary to make an adjustment in the accounts in the balance carried forward on profit and loss account at that date. But a year ago the full effect of the fall in demand for the lines in question was not foreseen.

The drop in sales – at least the company does give a sales figure - was due to the closing down of the manufacturing business in October 1966. Sales of the Somportex subsidiary actually rose by over 15 per cent. The trading loss of £8,262 is shown after making full provision for the loss on non-seasonal lines and includes the loss incurred on the realization of the manufacturing stocks caused by closing the Stockton factory. As the lease of the works has not yet been disposed of, allowance has also been made for the rent to April 30th, 1968.

Provision for losses on fixed assets in the Stockton group not yet realized includes the writing down to nil of the lease and equipment of the Gingham Kitchen business and of the lease of the factory. It is thought prudent to attribute no value to the leases and apart from those items only one piece of plant valued by the directors at £1,300 remains to be realized.

The current year is expected to show a profit but as most of the Somportex goods are imported, prospects are

CITY NOTES

NEW developments in the Far East have pushed one more element into the hardening process of City prices. The 'Pueblo' spy ship crisis led to the hoisting of metal and commodity prices on City markets, with pressure particularly keen on 'spot' quotations.

The present level of commodity and metal prices owes much to the continued existence of 'war' demand. An outbreak of peace would certainly see prices falling far and fearsomely. But an outbreak of peace in the American presidential year is something that need not be taken at all seriously.

There are therefore most things in favour of higher metal and commodity prices and few things against – at least that is the situation while Vietnam continues as a major war and 'Pueblo'-type incidents continue to show the keenness of the razor edge on which the war-peace game is balanced.

This applies to a similar degree in stock-markets where, with both the United Kingdom and the United States bent on retrenchment and on improving their respective balance of payments, it is still the United States war and international defence effort that will basically keep the scale well and truly down on the side of continued inflation and continued equity growth.

While war conditions persist there is not much chance of balance of payments preoccupation leading to industrial recession.

THE intended merger of Westminster Bank and National Provincial Bank – and the assumed merger of Martins Bank with one of the other of the present 'Big Five' – has, as one of its root causes, the extent of bank capital spending on computers. National Provincial alone is committed to spending £10 million over the next three years on a combination of replacement and extension of present computer systems. Westminster's expenditure in this direction is described as 'substantial' and there is clearly something to be gained from computer rationalization. Probably more to be gained, for example, than there is from any immediate rationalization of branches between the two banks. Closing down a Natpro branch and transferring operations to a neighbouring Westminster branch – or vice versa – may look simple but if space in both branches is fully occupied then there is an impossible quart and pint pot situation. The merger will no doubt bring savings in new branch development rather than in existing branch savings.

THERE is, as some industrialists are so keen to point out, no attribute in size for size's sake, but in some spheres of business, growth in size is regarded as inevitable. In the building society world, for example, growth by the Abbey National Building Society to assets of over £1,000 million has not called for any great celebration. 'It was,' as Sir Roy Matthews, Abbey National's chairman, said recently, 'inevitable'. Even so, £1,000 million is something more than an ordinary milestone.

Last year Abbey National lent a record £210 million on mortgage compared with £165 million in 1966, but improving on the £210 million mark this year is considered doubtful. 'It would not surprise me if we did not lend so much' is the chairman's comment.

If interest rates maintain their present high level for a comparatively long time there will have to be an upward adjustment in building society rates at some stage, although the present general intention in the industry is to hold the position at least until after the Budget. Currently, the building society investment rate, grossed up at the standard rate of income tax, is less than Bank rate.

Intentionally, Abbey National has built up liquid funds to a high level so that the present interest rate structure can be maintained during the current period of uncertainty.

Correspondence

Published Company Accounts

SIR, - Mr Norris's letter (January 27th, issue) relating to my article in your issue of January 6th, was interesting in so far as he distinguishes between obiter dicta and particular decisions. In the case in question it appears to me that Buckley, J.'s conclusion depended in part or whole on the premise that the funds being capital profits were available for distribution in cash to ordinary shareholders. It may be that other judges are not bound by obiter dicta as such, but if they deny Buckley, J.'s supposed premise they must necessarily deny his conclusion. This would offend against the rule of precedent. That there are difficulties it is not denied - the question was discussed fairly thoroughly in an article published in The Accountant of March 3rd, 1962. I then took pains to examine the facts of the case rather carefully and Mr Norris may care to read this particular article.

Mr Norris's final point as to whether profits may properly be distributed when losses have been made in prior years is something slightly different, but nevertheless of particular interest. The question is whether each financial year may be treated as a separate trading venture when one starts off with the capital one has left at the end of the previous venture or period, or whether a number of years must be taken together and whether original capital must be maintained intact before any profit can be either distributed

One then has to face problems concerning the definition of capital and whether or not changes in the value of money must be taken into account. If they are not, and an historical cost basis of accounting is used, it is quite likely that real profits will be overstated and real losses concealed, and that nominal profits on, say, revaluation, will be treated as real profits and distributed as such, thus bringing about, as was suggested in my recent article, reduction of capital.

Yours faithfully,

Barry, Glam.

MICHAEL J. GREENER.

Cost-benefit Analysis

SIR, - It was unfortunate that R. F. J. Dewhurst's article 'Cost-benefit Analysis' (The Accountant, January 20th, 1968) lacked references to the literature on the subject.

A recent study contained the following conclusions:

'... it must be emphasized once more that measurement presents often insuperable complications. Benefits may be of such an intangible nature that no market determined price can be used as a basis for imputing a value to them. . . .

'The specialists are not agreed that the rate of return derived in cost-benefit analysis can legitimately be compared with other rates of return. Choices among rates of interest and rates of discount can present formidable difficulties, while precisely what weight is to be given to benefits received by different groups of individuals is difficult to decide in the probably permanent absence of equal distribution of wealth and income.

'In some applications the attempt to record benefits in monetary terms has already given way to the construction of "scales of effectiveness" insecurely based essentially on value-judgements of the analysts. In other cases, notably education, the results of cost-benefit analysis, while potentially interesting, should be viewed with caution.' (Cost-Benefit Analysis and Public Expenditure - G. H. Peters (1966), page 42.)

Elsewhere it was concluded:

"The foregoing discussion leads to two major conclusions: First, judgement plays such an important role in the estimation of benefit-cost ratios that little significance can be attached to the precise numerical results obtained . . . Second, competition is likely to drive the agencies towards increasingly optimistic estimates; and far from resolving the organizational difficulties, computation of benefit-cost ratios may in fact make them worse.' (Surveys of Economic Theory, Vol. III: Resource Allocation (1966),

Clearly, if the accountant is to venture on to the thin ice of cost-benefit analysis, he must proceed with considerable caution.

Incidentally, Mr Dewhurst appears to suggest that the accountant could arbitrate on the desirability of spending an extra £100,000 on museums or art galleries or libraries. The role of the technologist (whether accountant-cum-economist or economist-cum-accountant) is limited to the technical task of economic appraisal. It is for public opinion, as reflected in the legislature, to determine policy (i.e. make a value judgement) with the aid of the best information concerning the consequences of their collective choice, and in accordance with the community's goals.

Yours faithfully,

D. BAILEY.

P.A.Y.E. Tables

SIR, - Special P.A.Y.E. weekly tax tables have been printed for weeks forty-eight to fifty-two of the current fiscal year. This is because 1968 is a leap year and paragraph one of the 'Directions' on the front page states clearly that these tables will not be needed again after April 5th, 1968.

As far as I can see these are identical with the tables printed for 1965-66 which are otherwise in current use, except that the dates for each week are altered by one day to allow for the leap year. The tables themselves appear to me to be identical.

I would have thought it sufficient for the Revenue to issue amendment slips to alter the dates by one day in each week instead of reprinting a forty-eight page booklet. At a guess there are about one million P.A.Y.E. schemes in the country, and the cost of printing and distributing the tables to tax offices and employers is probably at least £250,000.

No wonder the paper on which the tables are produced looks bloodshot!

Yours faithfully,

Manchester.

Better Understanding Urged Between Management and Accountants

Chartered Accountants' Dinner at Portsmouth

THE increasing importance in the technological age of understanding between management and accountants was stressed by speakers at the third annual dinner of the Southern Society of Chartered Accountants held at the Guildhall, Portsmouth, on Friday of last week.

It was emphasized by Mr H. A. Collinson, F.R.I.C., who proposed the toast to The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, and was taken up again by the Institute's Deputy President, Mr Stanley Dixon, M.A., F.C.A., when he responded.

Mr Collinson, chairman and managing director of the Borden Chemical Company (U.K.) Ltd, said he would like to see management staffs with a greater knowledge of accountancy, and accountants taking the same attitude towards management. Without this composite approach, it would be impossible to achieve anything worth while in a state of rapid change and growth.

He said that it was not until he became a managing director ten years ago that he realized what the accountant could be to a manager in industry — mentor, guardian and friend. With the help of accountants it had been possible to assess the whole of the company's position, bring in marginal costing and monthly profit and loss accounts, and determine forecasts in the light of reserves and money either in or owed to the bank.

A Reformed Character

Mr Collinson admitted that in terms of his attitude towards accountancy, he was a reformed character. When he was a young chemist, he engaged in battles with accountants. Now he had a real regard for the profession, but not all directors appreciated what could be done for them by accountants.

Mr Collinson went on to say that certain companies had spent a great deal of time making organization charts so that everything was 'boxed up and laid down', and anyone knew just what to do in a certain set of circumstances.

This was all right in a static situation, but more often than not the situation was far from static. He declared that what was needed most was a composite between a directive for day-to-day established practices and procedures, and also a flexibility and freedom of mind to approach new developments.

It worried him that people tended to become over specialized and more concerned with their function in a company as a unit, rather than their contribution as a whole.

More Positive Line

Mr Collinson said he would like to see managements with greater knowledge of accountants and the work they perform, and to see accountants taking a more positive line with management.

In the truly international company, a variety of accounting systems arose. Different countries had different tax systems, and it was important for accountants to be familiar with these, even in terms of languages and the jargon used.

Mr Dixon, in his reply, said that something was already being done regarding the problems posed by Mr Collinson, including the formation of an international study group on accounting practice. He believed that during the past ten years there had been great advances in the contribution which the accountant made to management. This applied not only to those in industry but also to those in practice, because it helped to make even the smallest client more efficient.

Council Disappointed

Mr Dixon went on to refer to the new techniques which were being used by mathematicians in the service of industry, and said that if accountants were to keep their place, it was essential that they should equip themselves with these techniques. It was for this reason that the Council of the Institute were disappointed that so few members had taken the Certificate of Management Information examination, or had gone on to take the Joint Diploma in Management Accounting Services.

Speaking on the future of the profession, Mr Dixon said that within a few months members would be receiving details of the proposed integration arrangements with the other accounting bodies.

Some of the proposals might give rise to misgivings, he said, but it was necessary to look ahead for twenty years or more, and if the accountancy profession was to continue to provide the service expected of it, and play its part in the economy of the country, then it must be a united profession. There was no need for two bodies one for practising members and one for those in industry - speaking with a different voice on important matters, each with a separate organization, each competing with the other, and each wooing universities to educate students for slightly different examinations. These, he added, were real, practical arguments in favour of integration.

Basically, an accountant, whether in industry or private practice, was a member of one profession and Mr Dixon hoped members would keep this in mind when they came to consider the proposals.

The toast to the guests was proposed by Mr D. J. Gulliford, F.C.A., President of the Society, and the response was by Mr A. L. Blake, M.C., LL.B.

Mr Henry Scurrah Wainwright, O.B.E., F.C.A., died peacefully at his home in Leeds on Sunday, January 14th, in his out year.

Articled to the late Mr William Adgie, a partner in the firm of Beevers & Adgie, Mr Wainwright was admitted to membership of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales in 1901. He became a partner in the firm with which he served his articles in 1905 and senior partner in 1948. He served the profession well, holding office twice as President of the Leeds, Bradford and District Society of Chartered Accountants. the development of the profession. Accompanied by his wife, he was a regular attender at the Institute's Autumn Meetings.

His busy professional life apart, Mr Wainwright was a most distinguished gardener, specializing in growing roses and delphiniums - his collection of the latter being one of the finest in the country. He opened his garden regularly for charities and his numerous friends, and for over forty years was President or Chairman of the Leeds Flower Show. He gave time, money and technical advice to the development of the Northern Horticultural Society's gardens at Harlow Carr, Harrogate, and saw them grow to their present forty-five acres - a veritable 'Wisley of the north'. In 1939 he received the O.B.E. in recognition of his services to the many public and charitable bodies with which he was associated.

Throughout the fifty-six years of a very happy marriage Mr Wainwright received the most active support and encouragement from his wife who died in 1962. Many members of the profession will remember with gratitude the wise guidance and counsel which he was always willing to extend to others. He is survived by his son, Mr R. S. Wainwright, M.P., F.C.A., the Liberal Member of Parliament for the Colne Valley division of Yorkshire.

IN PARLIAMENT £ Sterling

Sir C. OSBORNE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the present internal purchasing power of the £ as compared with 20s in 1945, and with 20s in October, 1964, respectively.

Mr HAROLD LEVER: It is not possible to make an estimate of the present purchasing power of the £ compared with 20s in 1945. Taking the internal purchasing power of the £ as 20s in 1946 and in October, 1964, its value in December, 1967, the latest date for which information is available, is estimated at 9s 6d and 17s 10d respectively.

These estimates are based on changes in the consumer price index for calendar years, adjusted by movements in the retail price index for the months at the beginning and end of the period.

Hansard, Jan. 23rd, 1968. Written answers, col. 59.

Dividends

Mr BISHOP asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he proposes to take under the Prices and Incomes Act to require the compulsory notification from companies of higher dividend decisions.

Mr ROY JENKINS: None at present. In the period from July 20th to January 8th, 1968, 331 quoted public companies reduced their dividends as against 384 making increases plus 511 remaining constant. The Government attach great importance to companies continuing to exercise moderation in distributions.

SHAREHOLDER'S RIGHTS AND RESPONSIBILITIES

A second edition of the booklet Shareholder's Rights and Responsibilities has been issued by the Wider Share Ownership Council and covers the amendments made by the 1967 Companies Act.

Intended as a guide to give new investors an appreciation of their rights and responsibilities, the booklet in a chapter on annual general meetings states that 'It is regrettable that investors do not make more use of the meetings to question directors on the progress and future policy of the company. All too often these meetings are drab, formal affairs fulfilling no requirements except the strict regulations of the Companies Act. This is often the fault of the shareholders, rather than the directors'. The booklet also includes chapters on the history of the public company, the role of the Stock Exchange, and the distinctions between different kinds

Copies of the booklet are obtainable from the Executive Secretary, Wider Share Ownership Council, 4 Angel Court, London EC2. A 4d postage stamp should be enclosed with the request.

Some Press comments

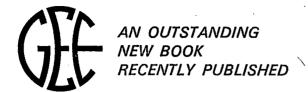

To all those in search of a primer on the levy provisions of The Land Commission Act 1967, this work can be confidently recommended.

The Financial Times, December 4th, 1967

The Land Commission Act 1967 – even ignoring the many regulations already made under it – covers some 189 pages with extraordinarily abstruse language. What then is the busy man to do who wants to find out quickly what the levy is all about and how it works? One very good answer is to acquire a copy of this handy paperback which, in 120 pages, gives a succinct account of the principal provisions, with appropriately illuminating examples.

Price 55s net 56s 6d post free U.K. 59s 6d post free Overseas According to the National Economic Development Council Report on Management Recruiting and Development some 350,000 managers are engaged in the manufacturing industry alone. Their jobs and those of their colleagues elsewhere are changing. The new breed of managers are technologically-minded men eager for the right information on which to base their decisions.

Behind the change lies the evolution of management sciences and services — among them operational research, linear programming, network analysis, systems analysis, applications of the computer, consultancy, and marketing research.

The earlier chapters of this book are devoted to planning, organization, direction and policy-making and the process of decision.

Further the author tries to show where operational research, network analysis, computer installations, and consultancy come into activities. Finally he has examined the divisions of marketing and purchasing from the standpoint of a board of directors which is responsible for discharging planning and control functions rather than with the eyes of a sales or purchasing specialist.

For the director or chief executive, his review of basic management activities should strike answering chords. For middle management it should provide a stimulus to progress towards even higher responsibilities.

For the student of management whose immediate objective is the successful completion of a degree or diploma course, or who is on the way to achieving the status of a qualified accountant, cost accountant, company secretary, work study practitioner, purchasing officer, O. & M. manager, marketing manager, or training officer there should be a special benefit to be drawn from the author's integrated approach to his subject.

Build agains inflation

Make a direct investment in bricks & mortar through The City of Westminster Assurance Society's

investing directly in freehold shops, factories and offices

Property is always good news! The Society believes that Real Estate provides better protection against inflation than any other form of investment—and an extremely profitable one at that. Property values generally have doubled in the past 15 years. The Fund's properties are all Freehold and the average investment in each property does not normally exceed 5% of the Fund's total assets, thereby ensuring a wide, secure spread.

Age of Properties owned	% of Portfolio (by value)
•	at February 1968
Built prior to 1930	12%
" between 1930 and 1960	18%
after 1060	70%

Your investment in the Fund will give you valuable taxation advantages. Property Units are of the "accumulator" type, the rents received by the Fund being ploughed back to increase the value of the Units. Capital Gains will also increase the Units' value. Since the Property Unit Fund started in August, 1966, the Unit value has risen from 5/3d to 6/2½d—an increase of 18½% in eighteen months.

How to invest in the Fund The Units are offered in the form of Property Bonds costing £45 each (if you are aged up to 65) or £48 (over 65). You and your family—including children—can hold up to a maximum of 40 Bonds each. The cost of the Bonds is treated as a Life Assurance premium and therefore limited Income Tax relief on the cost can be obtained by tax-payers. On death (except when this occurs before the attainment of 10 years of age) the benefit payable in respect of each Bond is £50, or the value of the Units, whichever is the greater.

£50, or the value of the Units, whichever is the greater. The Bonds can be held as long as you wish, and when cashed (in whole or part) the proceeds are ENTIRELY FREE OF INCOME TAX, SURTAX and CAPITAL GAINS TAX under present legislation.

Capital Growth The Fund's present investments yield an annual income of over 10% gross on the cost of the properties, and the yield from future investments is expected to maintain this level. Assuming this rate of income continues, the value of each Property Bond will grow as follows:

FREE OF ALL TAX

Optional 6% tax-free income plan for holders of 5 or more Property Bonds Under this Plan a sufficient number of Units are cashed each October (first payment 1968) to provide an income equal to 6% p.a. of your original investment free of income tax & surtax. Although the number of Units held will decrease each year, the anticipated rise in the value of the remaining Units should at least maintain the value of your original investment. Life Assurance cover decreases proportionately as Units are cashed. You can adopt this Plan from the outset or at any future date by notifying the Society.

General Information The Fund is valued and the Unit value adjusted at monthly intervals to reflect changes in the total value of the investments. Current values of the Units are published daily in the Financial Times.

Initial Management charges and the cost of the Life Assurance absorb 5% of the cost of each Bond; the balance of 95% purchases Property Units. Thereafter, Management charges are limited to $% per annum of the Fund.

PRESS COMMENTS:

The Block Exchange Gazette The City of Westminster Assurance Society has launched an interesting neso unit trust scheme. The unit investor is offered a direct stake in property investment rather than in a fund holding property company shares. There are clear cut advantages in this. Property Companies have to pay Corporation Tax at 40% on their earnings and the gross dividend comes out of the balance. Income Tax deducted from these dividend payments is handed over to the Revenue. But the property revenues of the City of Westminster scheme go into a fund which is taxed at 7/6d in the f, at the most and the build-up of income bears no further imposition.

Daily Mail The large institutional investors are investing in property. It is a good and the City of Westminster Assurance have contrived an ingenious unit trust scheme—Property Unit Fund—to allow ordinary savers to join in this rewarding form of investment.

The Times Some Funds with tax advantages are even run from the United Kinadom The

The service A L Factors offers you is being used by a wide range of expanding companies which previously suffered from "growing pains". A L Factors, associated with an old established merchant bank, is helping many companies to make better use of their assets by providing immediate finance against sales and complete bad debt protection.

They also relieve companies of all the headaches of sales ledger administration and collection work. Companies are able to operate on a cash-on-delivery basis yet their customers can still take normal trade credit.

The benefits of this service are widespread, and companies throughout the country are achieving greater turnover, reduced overheads and larger profits through using A L Factors. The cost of this comprehensive service is surprisingly low and although we do not suggest it is the answer to every company's problems, we do suggest it is worth investigating. inflation

Impossible to doubt the desirability of protection of this kind. Unfortunately, the very nature of most pension schemes leaves them largely at the mercy of long-term inflationary trends.

The solution can be a privately administered pension plan with wider latitude in its investment provisions. This is the basis on which we work at Chase Manhattan. In conjunction with an independent consulting actuary, we would aim to provide for you a plan which is weighted in favour of growth investment. Protection against inflation is, as a result, built in.

Why not have a chat with us, let us show you how, in conjunction with an independent consulting actuary, a plan can be prepared to meet your organization's precise requirements. You'll discover just what an advantage it is to have a friend at Chase Manhattan.

Sound Advice

WHEN the then Chancellor of the Exchequer announced his new package deal in April 1965, it was based very largely on theory. There were many among those with long practical experience of taxation who at once took the view that the theory was in many respects unsound, but at that time no one could be entirely certain how the theory would work out in practice. Now we do know, and there is at least one informed body of opinion which can say 'I told you so'. The Confederation of British Industry, having expressed its views to the present Chancellor in good time before his coming Budget, has now published those views in a booklet entitled *The Budget 1968.*¹ The booklet deserves close study by all tax experts, amateur and professional, which includes all Members of Parliament in one capacity or another.

Apart from the mammoth Finance Act 1965, there have been changes brought about by the selective employment tax and by the new system of investment grants in place of the old investment allowances. The Confederation says with truth that these changes have substantially and unnecessarily enlarged the area of ministerial discretion and thus made the system more arbitrary and more complex. The selective employment tax was essentially a theorist's tax and it has lamentably failed. The new system of investment grants was accompanied by changes under which practically everything is at the discretion of the Board of Trade and therefore the trader cannot know whether he will get a grant or not; in the old investment allowance days one knew fairly well where one stood.

On the general tax front the Confederation would like to see greater emphasis on taxation of consumption and less on taxation on effort and risk-taking. It recommends a broadly based sales tax at a low rate, or a tax on added value as now being adopted in the Common Market. This would be in place of the highly selective purchase tax which is at such high rates as to produce distortions.

Coming from such a source, the booklet naturally has a good deal to say about the new direct tax system which it accuses with justice of having a number of defects. The system bears heavily on income from equity investment where risk-taking should be encouraged rather than penalized. It distorts the pattern of company finance by taxing share capital raised from the market more heavily than capital generated by firms internally. The close company legislation makes incorporation prohibitively expensive for small concerns. The C.B.I. says the provisions about distributions have failed in their objective of increasing the proportion of company profits retained, which in any case was not a sound objective. The C.B.I. would like dividends to be franked by the corporation tax paid on the profits out of which the dividends are made. This surely is right; the concept of the body of shareholders being economically divorced from the company itself is a completely false one. Moreover, it is not logically followed, for a company which receives a dividend out of profits charged to corporation tax receives it franked of such tax.

Taxing Overseas Income

ACCORDING to the results of a Board of Trade survey published in its Journal for January 26th, the book value of U.K. direct investments overseas at the end of 1966 exceeded the value of foreign direct investment in the U.K. by £2,300 million, i.e. £4,500 million against £2,200 million. Despite, or perhaps a contribution to, the sterling crisis, the gap between these two totals has widened in recent years from £1,910 million at the end of 1960 to the above total. The increase is largely accounted for by the £1,550 million increase in U.K. overseas investment from £2,950 million at end 1960 to the end 1966 figure above, i.e. £4,500 million.

Nevertheless, the rate of growth in inward investment – investment by foreigners in the U.K. – has been higher than that of outward investment. While the former has grown at an annual compound rate of 11 per cent, the latter has increased at only $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent compound. As the report in the Board of Trade Journal explains, this is due partly to the fact that much of the U.K. investment was made before the war.

It is such considerations which have been used to justify the Government's restrictions on overseas investment by U.K. companies. Nevertheless, in a world which is becoming increasingly international in outlook as far as industry and trade are concerned, such restrictive policies do not provide a sound basis for overseas economic policy. In a memorandum to the Chancellor of the Exchequer last week the British National Committee of the International Chamber of Commerce stresses that it is in the long-term interests of the U.K. to work towards the elimination of all restrictions on the free movement of capital among nations.

The committee states that quite apart from the fact, as demonstrated by United States experience, that international production has come to be the primary means of stimulating inter-nation demand for each others' goods, Britain has a special responsibility to stimulate the flow of private development capital to the emergent countries.

Unfortunately, in the opinion of the committee, recent U.K. tax legislation is calculated to hinder such desirable development rather than encourage it. In particular, the committee puts forward a number of proposals for the Chancellor's consideration with a view to ameliorating the present position. The first is that because the present system of corporation tax-cum-withholding tax is heavily biased against overseas investments, overseas tax not set-off against corporation tax should be allowed against the Schedule F tax. Alternatively, if that proposal should prove unacceptable, the Chancellor is asked to modify the present overspill arrangements.

The committee, in any case, is highly critical of the present overspill arrangements for not only are they considered to be inadequate but they are also only temporary. They do not provide a solution to the difficulty that the present U.K. tax policy is a violation of the principle that overseas income taxed in two countries should not bear more than the higher of the two countries' tax rates. Accordingly, the committee asks that the provisions relating to the tapering-off of the overspill relief should be withdrawn.

The effect of the recent increase of $2\frac{1}{2}$ points in the rate of corporation tax will have the incidental effect of reducing the overspill relief calculated under the formula in section 84 of the Finance Act 1965. The committee considers that this was not the intention when the corporation tax rate was increased, and therefore it would be fair to retain the original 40 per cent rate for all section 84 computations.

Where dividends are paid by a foreign company to a U.K. company which controls not less than one-quarter of the voting power in the foreign company, credit against corporation tax may be claimed in respect of the tax paid by the foreign company. The control fraction is currently in the process of being reduced to 10 per cent for both Commonwealth and non-Commonwealth companies, but the committee is anxious to ensure the universal adoption of the lower fraction. In the case of a very large foreign company the U.K. company's interest may be less than 10 per cent of the voting power, but may exceed in value the holding of another company in a smaller overseas business. In the circumstances, asserts the committee, any possible anomaly could be removed by allowing the relief for foreign tax if the investment is substantial, irrespective of its ratio to the foreign company's equity.

Some slight comfort may be derived from the recent statement in Parliament by the CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER to the effect that firms wishing to invest in overseas projects directly designed to promote U.K. exports will be able to buy foreign exchange at the official rate up to an amount of £50,000, provided that the prospective benefit to the U.K. balance of payments will equal or exceed the total cost of the investment within eighteen months and will continue thereafter

'Cheap' or 'Legitimate' Avoidance?

PRIOR to 1954 the Chancery Division of the High Court readily lent its assistance to schemes for varying the trusts of settled property with a view to avoiding estate duty and other taxes. Then, in 1954, the House of Lords held that the Court had no power to do this merely because it was for the benefit of infant or unborn beneficiaries, except where there was a compromise of a genuine dispute or some emergency.

This House of Lords decision was apparently regarded by Parliament as unfortunate for, in 1958, there was passed the Variation of Trusts Act. Section 1 (1) of this Act empowers the Court to approve, on behalf of beneficiaries who are themselves incapable of assenting, any arrangement varying or revoking all or any of the trusts. Except in the case of ultimate objects of a protective trust, the Court has to be satisfied that the arrangement is for the benefit of the infant or unborn beneficiaries on whose behalf the Court gives its approval. Ever since that Act was passed the power of the Court has been extensively used for approving arrangements designed solely to relieve the settled funds of taxation, particularly estate duty and, latterly, capital gains tax. No one has ever questioned the principle that it is for the benefit of an infant or unborn person that he should eventually obtain his share of the settled fund, freed as far as possible from the burden of

In 1961 MR JUSTICE BUCKLEY approved an arrangement under which an English marriage settlement was revoked and all the funds were transferred to the trustee of a newly-formed Canadian settlement on similar trusts for the same beneficiaries, the object being to avoid British estate duty on the death of the husband or the wife, to avoid some double taxation of the income, and to be free of exchange control restrictions (Seale's Marriage Settlement [1961] Ch. 574.) Since the making of the marriage settlement the husband and wife had emigrated to Canada and had become domiciled in the province of Quebec, where their children also were living.

BUCKLEY, J., was satisfied that all the parties were likely to continue to live in Canada and that it would be for the general advantage of all the beneficiaries that the administrative and other difficulties resulting from the residence of the beneficiaries in Canada should be brought to an end. He added that he was also satisfied that the arrangement was sensible and advantageous for all concerned.

Last week, however, an application under the same Act to approve the transfer of settled funds to Jersey was rejected.

The applicant was MF STANLEY WESTON, former chairman of the Stanley Weston Group which owned a chain of retail chemists based on Sheffield. In 1964 he had made two voluntary settlements. The principal beneficiary of one of them was his younger son and the settled fund consisted almost exclusively of shares in the group with a present value of some £400,000. The other settlement was made on the marriage of MR WESTON'S elder son and the fund consisted exclusively of shares in the group worth some £320,000.

Early in 1967 MR WESTON had bought a house, 'Chantal', in Jersey. In August 1967, he had taken up residence there along with his wife and younger son and proposed to reside there permanently. The elder son and his wife had also taken up residence in Jersey in the same year. If the shares subject to the trusts of the settlements were to be sold now, it was estimated that such sale would give rise to a liability to capital gains tax of many thousands of pounds.

MR WESTON asked the Court to approve, on behalf of those beneficiaries who were not sui juris, an arrangement under which two Jersey professional men would be appointed trustees of both settlements in place of the English trustees, with power, after the expiration of three months, to discharge the trust property from the trusts of the English settlements and to subject it instead to the trusts of Jersey settlements, containing almost precisely the same trusts. For capital gains tax purposes, trustees of a settlement are treated as resident and ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom (and therefore subject to capital gains tax) 'unless the general administration of the trusts is ordinarily carried on outside the United Kingdom' and a majority of the trustees are not resident or not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom (Finance Act 1965, section 25 (1)). Thus when the shares were sold or deemed to be sold they would not attract the tax. Moreover, on the deaths of the principal beneficiaries, exemption from estate duty would be conferred by section 28 (2) of the Finance Act 1949 provided that the property was not then in Great Britain, the proper law of the settlements was not that of England or Scotland, and the deceased died domiciled outside Great Britain.

MR JUSTICE STAMP said that although the Court was not the watchdog of the Inland Revenue, there must be
